To

CHARLES WALTER DUMONT

more than to any other man is due the existence of the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure. His was the idea; his was the plan; and his has been the business ability and energetic management, as organizer and president of The American Law Book Company, which have made possible the successful publication of these volumes, which are therefore respectfully dedicated to him.

William Mack.

Derivation of term.— Larceny is derived from the Norman-French "larcyn" and signifies a felonious and wrongful taking and carrying away, by any person, of the personal goods of another, with felonious intent to convert them to his own use and make them his own property without the owner's consent. State v. Rechnitz, 20 Mont. 488, 52 Pac. 264. Larceny is an infamous crime. Hall v. Doyle, 35 Ark. 445; Williams v. U. S., 4 Indian Terr. 204, 69 S. W. 849.

Distinguished from false pretenses.— In most jurisdictions the two offenses (larceny and obtaining property by false pretenses) are distinct and neither is included in the other. Dominick v. State, 40 Ala. 680, 91 Am. Dec. 496; Hirshfield v. State, 11 Tex. App. 207; Witherspoon v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1896) 37 S. W. 433 [overruling Sims v. State, 21 Tex. But the distinction between larceny by trick and obtaining property by false pretense is a narrow one. In both the property is voluntarily relinquished by the owner and possession secured by the prisoner through a trick or false pretense, and in both the accused secures the property with intent to convert it to his own use. The distinction between the two crimes lies in the intention with which the owner parts with the property; if his intention is to invest the accused with the mere possession only of the property, and the latter with the requisite intent receives it and converts it to his own use, it is larceny. People v. Rae, 66 Cal. 423, 6 Pac. 1, 56 Am. Rep. 102; Stinson v. People, 43 Ill. 397; March v. State, 117 Ind. 547, 20 N. E. 444; People v. Morse, 99 N. Y. 662, 2 N. E. 45 [affirming 3 N. Rep. 120. And see Smith v. People, 53 N. Y. 111, 13 Am. Rep. 474. But if the owner in parting with the property intends to invest the accused with the title also, the latter has committed the crime of obtaining the property by false pretense. State v. Styner, 154 Ind. 131, 56 N. E. 98; State v. Dickinson, 21 Mont. 595, 55 Pac. 539; Zink v. People, 77 N. Y. 114, 33 Am. Rep. 589 [reversing 16 Hun 396]; Thorne v. Turck, 10 Daly (N. In Grunson v. State, 89 Ind. 533, 46 Am. Rep. 178, the court made the test between false pretense and larceny, not the intent of the owner to pass title, but whether he in fact passed title; holding that if the transaction does not result in law in passing title to the property, the obtaining of it by a trick is larceny. This however is erroneous and would make all cases of false pretense larceny, for in all such cases only a voidable title passes. So it has been decided that when the property is delivered to the accused by another than the owner, the question whether the obtaining constitutes larceny or false pretense depends not only on the intent with which such person delivers the property, but also on his authority over it. If he intends to pass the title, and he has authority so to do, the obtaining with intent to convert it is the crime of obtaining by false pretense. Com. v. Mulrey, 170 Mass. 103, 49 N. E. 91; Reg. v. Thompson, 9 Cox C. C. 222, 8 Jur. N. S. 1162, L. & C. 233, 32 L. J. M. C. 57, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 393, 11 Wkly. Rep. 41; Reg. v. Essex, 7 Cox C. C. 384, Dears. & B. 369, 371, 4 Jur. N. S. 15, 27 L. J. M. C. 20, 6 Wkly. Rep. 82; Reg. v. Barnes, 5 Cox C. C. 112, 2 Den. C. C. 59, 14 Jur. 1123, 20 L. J. M. C. 34, T. & M. 387; Witchell's Case, 2 East P. C. 830. It may be further observed that the distinction heretofore stated applies equally to the obtaining of money as of other kinds of property. If a loan of money is obtained by false pretenses, under an agreement for the return of the identical money, and the borrower feloniously converts it, he is guilty of larceny, as the owner did not intend to part with the title to the money lent. Porter v. State, 23 Tex. App. 295, 4 S. W. 889. But if the lender did not expect to receive back the identical money lent, but only an equal amount in other money, then the conversion would constitute the crime of obtaining by false pretense. Welsh v. People, 17 Ill. 339; Kelly v. People, 6 Hun (N. Y.) 509; Kellogg v. State, 26 Ohio St. 15. It is held to apply when the property is obtained by sham bets and gambling devices, as well as when other means are used. Nevertheless, the courts in their application of the rule, have not, owing to a different view taken of the same facts, always arrived at identical conclusions. Thus in Stinson v. People, 43 Ill. 397, where defendants made a pretended bet, one of them putting up the money and the other a mere package of waste paper, fraudulently marked as an express package containing money, and placed the same in a third person's hands with intent fraudulently to induce a party, really intending to bet, to part with his money, in a manner which seemed to him to involve a chance of winning something of value, when in fact nothing of value was staked against his money, a conviction for larceny was upheld, the court being of opinion that title to the money did not pass, it being delivered to be disposed of in a particular way only for his benefit, by staking it against an equal amount of money alleged to be, but which was not, in the package. See also Miller v. Com., 78 Ky. 15, 39 Am. Rep. 194; Com. v. Jenks, 138 Mass. 484; Loomis v. People, 67 N. Y. 322, 23 Am. Rep. 123; Defrese v. State, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 53, 8 Am. Rep. 1. But in Williams v. State, 34 Tex. 558, W inveigled prosecutor to bet ten dollars with him against a watch, on a gambling trick. Prosecutor, not having the money, staked a horse, and the horse and watch were delivered to an accomplice of W as stakeholder. On the development of the trick W claimed he had won and the horse was delivered to him with the consent of the prosecutor, although the prosecutor protested when W rode off with the horse. The court held it a case of false pretense, not larceny, saying that the prosecutor bet and lost either the horse or the ten dollars, that he placed the horse in the hands of the stakeholder, either as a thing bet or as a pledge. If the horse was bet and lost, then larceny

theft at common law is distinguished in two sorts, the one called "simple" or "plain" larceny, and the other "mixed" or "compound" larceny.[2]

2. "SIMPLE" OR "PLAIN" LARCENY. Simple or plain larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another;[3] it is larceny unaccompanied with any atrocious circumstances.[4]

3. "MIXED" OR "COMPOUND" LARCENY. Mixed or compound larceny has all the properties of simple or plain larceny, but is accompanied with either one or both of the aggravations of taking from one's house or person.[5]

C. "Single" Larceny. A single larceny consists in the stealing at one and the same time, or by one continuous operation, all the goods, no matter to whom belonging, which the thief had a preconceived intention of stealing.[6]

D. "Theft" or "Stealing." In some jurisdictions offenses usually styled as larcenies are denominated in the statutory definitions as thefts,[7] or as stealings.[8]

II. SUBJECTS OF LARCENY.

A. In General. At common law the only subjects of larceny were tangible, movable chattels; something which could be taken in possession and carried away, and which had some, although trifling, intrinsic value.[9] Any substance which has length, breadth, and thickness may be the subject of larceny, whether it is a solid, a liquid, or a gas, provided it is the subject of private ownership. Illuminating gas,[10] or water supplied by a water company and standing in was not committed because prosecutor intended to part with property. The doctrine of asportation in larceny has no place in the offense of obtaining by false pretense. State v. Fraker, 148 Mo. 143, 49 S. W. 1017.

Other definitions are: "A felonious and fraudulent taking and carrying away, by any Person, of the mere personal Goods of another, not from the Person, nor out of his House, above the Value of twelve Pence." Hawkins P. C. c. 33, § 1.

The old word "larceny" has disappeared from our criminal terminology, as simplified by the code, and the word "theft" (i. e. stealing) has been substituted. Reg. v. Conlin, 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 41, 45.

"Theft" is a popular name for "larceny" (State v. Boyce, 65 Ark. 82, 83, 44 S. W. 1043; Bouvier L. Dict. [quoted in People v. Donohue, 84 N. Y. 438, 442]), and is often used as synonymous with the latter term (People v. Donohue, supra; Mathews v. State, 36 Tex. 675; 4 Blackstone Comm. 230).

8. Can. Rev. St. (1886) c. 164; Can. Cr. Code (1892), § 305. See also Reg. v. Lyon, 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 242, 250, 29 Ont. 497.

Theft or stealing is defined by the code to be the act of fraudulently, and without color of right, taking anything with intent to deprive the owner temporarily or absolutely of such thing. Rex v. George, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 469, 470, 35 Nova Scotia 42.

The word "steal" or "stealing" imports the common-law offense of larceny; in fact "stealing" and "larceny" are often employed as synonymous in meaning. pipes,[11] or ice put away in an ice-house for domestic use are the subjects of larceny.[12] But nothing can be the subject of larceny in which there can be no ownership, such as a corpse.[13] The value may be less than the lowest coin.[14] That a lock has a key in it and is used to fasten a door is sufficient evidence of value.[15] But a thing like a letter or paper which has no intrinsic value cannot be the subject of larceny.[16] On this ground a passenger ticket stolen from the ticket office of a railroad company before it has been stamped and dated is not the subject of larceny.[17] And it has been held that a satisfaction piece of a mortgage fraudulently obtained from the mortgagee's agent, to whom it had been sent to be delivered on payment of the debt, could not be the subject of larceny, not yet being a valuable instrument.[18] But one who fraudulently secured a discharge paper of a soldier was convicted of larceny of paper.[19] The fact that property is illegally held or used is immaterial on the question of whether it is a subject of larceny.[20] If, however, the illegality prevents the property from having value the case is different. Indictment will not lie for larceny of "bills of credit of the United States Bank," of amounts less than such bank is authorized by its charter to issue, since such bills are void and of no value.[21]

B. Choses in Action or Other Documents — 1. At Common Law. A chose in action being in its essence intangible could not be the subject of larceny at common law, and the paper evidence of the chose in action was considered merged with it.[22]

2. By Statute — a. Introductory Statement. By statute various kinds of choses in action are commonly made subjects of larceny.[23]

b. Bank-Note. Bank-notes are made the subject of larceny by statute, either expressly, or under a statute making "promissory notes" or "property" generally subjects of larceny.[24] The term "bank-note" in a statute includes national bank-notes and treasury notes,[25] and the notes of banks of other states,[26] a note in the nature of a bank-note issued by an individual,[27] and redeemed bank-bills in the hands of the issuing bank's agents.[28] In short a "bank-note" embraces any available chose in action bearing that name.[29]

c. Commercial Paper. Promissory notes, bills of exchange, checks, and other commercial specialties are commonly made by statute subjects of larceny.[30] The following instruments have been held to fall within the statute: A silver certificate;[31] a county warrant;[32] a certificate of deposit in a bank;[33] a pension check of the United States government;[34] a due-bill if it has not been paid;[35] script certificates of a foreign railway company;[36] warehouse receipts;[37] and exchequer bills, although signed by a person not authorized to do so.[38] A document which is a complete bill of exchange in all respects except that of the signature of the drawer is, when in the hands of the intended drawer, a bill of exchange.[39] And a promissory note which, although not stamped as required by law, is enforceable in the hands of the holder, a bona fide purchaser, is a subject of larceny.[40] But a bill signed in blank by the accepter and so filled in by the drawer as not to be valid is neither a bill of exchange, an order for the payment of money, or a security for money.[41] Under a statute making the taking of bills obligatory punishable as larceny, the taking of one bill obligatory is larceny.[42]

d. Other Choses In Action or Documents. The following choses in action or written evidences of obligations are subjects of larceny by statute: Public records;[43] an obligation for the delivery of merchandise, which includes an order containing the owner's name and a measure of quantity, issued under an agreement by him to redeem it by delivering berries of the quantity named;[44] a memorandum book of accounts;[45] a written instrument by which pecuniary obligations are created or discharged, which includes a receipted voucher;[46] an instrument of writing, which applies only to the writing of another than the person charged;[47] an evidence of debt, which does not include a written memorandum of an unenforceable agreement;[48] a security for money, which includes a mortgage deed and title deeds accompanying it;[49] and an original document which does not include an authentic copy.[50] "Personal property" or "personal goods" includes money, foreign or domestic;[51] it does not include choses in action[52] or common receipts.[53] But it has been held that an accountable receipt is covered by the phrase, and so is a note payable in chattels.[54] Postage stamps remaining in the possession of the government, unissued, are subjects of larceny as "personal property belonging to the United States."[55] From a chose in action should be distinguished a token, used for purpose of identification, as a pawnbroker's duplicate, which is a subject of larceny.[56] Upon this ground a railroad ticket has been held the subject of larceny in England.[57] And so in Tennessee, as being a "valuable instrument or writing" under the statute.[58]

3. Paper Not Containing an Obligation. A piece of paper upon which there is writing not constituting or evidencing a binding obligation may be the subject of larceny, provided it has any value.[59] But it has been held that where one by fraud induces another to sign a receipt and then takes it from him he cannot be indicted for larceny, as the receipt never having taken effect by delivery was worthless.[60] So invalid bonds, notes, etc., are not the subject of larceny.[61] Although the circulation of the bills of the banks of other states is prohibited, and they are declared by law to be worthless, yet in the hands of a bona fide holder they are property, and may be the subject of larceny.[62]

C. Realty — 1. At Common Law — a. In General. holding that they are made subjects of larceny by general provisions of the statutes.[71]

D. Animals — 1. Animals Feræ Naturæ. Since larceny connotes the taking of property of another, there could be no larceny at common law of animals feræ naturæ unless they were reclaimed, confined, or dead, since otherwise they were not property. Wild animals in a natural state are not the subject of larceny;[72] and the same is true of fish not caught or confined,[73] and of wild birds flying at large.[74] A wild animal caught in a trap seems to be sufficiently brought into possession to be the subject of larceny.[75]

2. Reclaimed Animals Fit For Food. Larceny may be committed by taking any creatures whatever which are domitæ naturæ, and fit for food, as ducks, hens, geese, turkeys, or their eggs or young ones,[76] or peafowls.[77] Pigeons coming home to roost every night in wooden boxes hung on the outside of a house[78] or kept in ordinary dovecotes are sufficiently reclaimed.[79] So are pheasants or partridges hatched by a hen and under the care of the hen in a coop.[80] The same thing is true of bees which have been reclaimed and are in the possession of the owner,[81] and of fish as soon as caught,[82] or when in an artificial pond[83] or in nets in the water.[84] So of oysters or clams planted under public water in a bed where they do not exist naturally, and the bed is set off or inclosed by stakes or otherwise sufficient to show private possession.[85]

3. Domestic Animals. Domestic animals useful to man, although running at large, are subjects of larceny.[86] Reclaimed animals which are neither farm-yard animals nor useful for food, such as dogs and cats, are not subjects of larceny at common law;[87] but one may steal the collar on a dog.[88] Ferrets, although tame and salable, were not the subject of larceny.[89] Animals of the kind under consideration are usually held to be subjects of larceny under general statutes making personal property or goods and chattels the subject of larceny,[90] although there are decisions to the contrary;[91] and they are sometimes made subjects of larceny by express provision of statute.[92]

4. Animal Products. Food products of animals, alive or dead, are subjects of larceny. Thus milk from a cow,[93] wool from the backs of sheep,[94] or a "ham," although of an animal feræ naturæ,[95] is a subject of larceny.

away being essential elements of the crime of larceny, no subsequent connection with the property stolen can make one guilty of theft who was not connected with the original taking. One who trades for stolen property, having no complicity in the taking, is not guilty of larceny and his good faith is immaterial.[97] So one who after a theft is engaged by the thief to deliver the stolen property to another is not himself guilty of larceny, even though he knew the cattle to have been stolen.[98] And it was held error to refuse to instruct that no subsequent connection of defendant with the stolen property could make him guilty of larceny unless he were connected with the original taking.[99] So, there being no evidence of taking, it is error to instruct that the mere killing of a beef constitutes larceny.[1] If defendant did not participate in the original taking of the stolen property, the good or bad faith of a purchase subsequently made by him is immaterial.[2] But if possession is obtained directly from the owner defendant cannot rely on a purchase from a third person who had as he knew no right to sell.[3]

2. What Constitutes a Taking — a. In General. The act of taking possession involves the complete assumption of physical control over the chattel; which in turn requires both a complete severance of the chattel from the possession of the person from whom it was taken, and an assumption of actual control by the taker.

b. Momentary Possession Enough. If complete control is assumed and the goods are actually carried away, any, the least distance, it is enough, although the possession of the taker is immediately interrupted.[4] So where a thief being discovered in the very act of taking immediately abandoned or returned the thing, he had nevertheless completed the act of larceny.[5] Taking goods from a box or barrel and laying them on the floor beside it is enough to constitute a taking and carrying away.[6] Taking the goods and putting them into a receptacle for convenient removal is a sufficient taking and carrying away.[7]

c. Manual Touching Not Requisite. It is not necessary that the goods should actually be taken into the hands of the taker.[8]

d. Taking in a Receptacle. And where goods are in a receptacle, the thief may take them, while they still remain in the receptacle and without removing them therefrom, by exercising complete power of control over them.[9]

e. Taking a Receptacle With Its Contents. One who takes a thing in which, as he knows or supposes, another thing is contained, takes them both, and if he takes wrongfully and with intent to steal is guilty of the larceny of both. Thus where a thief stole a trunk containing money he may be convicted of larceny of the money.[10] And where one stole a box containing a watch he was held guilty of larceny of the watch.[11] And one who, knowing that a coat worn by a person contained money, seized the coat in the effort to steal the money, and, the coat coming off in his hands, returned the coat but kept the money, was held guilty of larceny of the money.[12] Upon this principle one who has been convicted of stealing a pocket-book cannot be afterward indicted for stealing the contents.[13]

f. Taking an Animal. The question what acts are sufficient to constitute taking and carrying away an animal depends upon the completeness of control thereby secured and exercised over the animal. To catch an animal and have it in hand is a sufficient taking.[14] So is leading an animal, as a horse.[15] And it has been held that the catching of a sheep and cutting of hobbles from its feet was sufficient.[16] Possession is not taken and the offense of larceny is not complete where defendant entices a hog for twenty yards on the owner's premises by dropping corn and then abandons it.[17] So chasing a hog is not a sufficient taking.[18] Shooting or killing an animal, without more, is not a taking possession.[19] If an animal is shot and then is taken hold of for the purpose of cutting

Applications of rule.— Thus drawing porter from a barrel into a can is a sufficient asportation of the porter drawn, although the prisoner has not yet touched the can containing it. Reg. v. Wallis, 3 Cox C. C. 67. Diverting gas from passing through a meter placed by the company to measure the gas, by inserting a pipe for that purpose, is an asportation of the gas at such junction. Reg. v. White, 3 C. & K. 363, 1 C. L. R. 489, 6 Cox C. C. 213, Dears. C. C. 203, 17 Jur. 536, 22 L. J. M. C. 123, 1 Wkly. Rep. 418. And in the same way diverting water wrongfully from the pipe of a water company to the taker's pipe is a sufficient taking. Ferens v. O'Brien, 11 Q. B. D. 21, 15 Cox C. C. 332, 47 J. P. 472, 52 L. or skinning, and in the process is moved at all, there is according to some decisions a sufficient taking and carrying away to constitute larceny.[20] In other cases, however, a different conclusion has been reached.[21] In one jurisdiction, owing perhaps to the statute doing away with the need of asportation, there is some uncertainty as to what constitutes sufficient taking of an animal.[22]

g. Exercise of Complete Control. Possession is not taken until the thief exercises a complete and exclusive control over the thing taken. Merely striking the hand of a person and knocking money to the ground, where it is lost, is not a taking into possession so as to constitute larceny.[23] So to jostle another so that a watch and chain drops from him is not a sufficient taking of the watch to constitute larceny.[24] And where a woman put her hand into the pocket of another woman, and her hand being seized by an officer the pocket was torn and a pocket-book dropped to the ground, there is not sufficient evidence of larceny, it not being shown that the prisoner's hand touched the pocket-book.[25] On the same principle where the prisoner compelled by threats another to lay down on the ground a bed he was carrying, and was then apprehended before he himself took it up, there was no larceny.[26] But if the chattel while lying on the ground is picked up by the thief, it is a sufficient taking.[27] Selling the goods of another without actually taking possession of them is not sufficient taking to constitute larceny. Where one has neither actual nor constructive possession of the property of another, but points it out and purports to sell it, receiving payment therefor, he does not commit larceny in the absence of some act constituting an asportation.[28] So where a wrong-doer, without himself taking actual possession of it, sells a steer at large upon the range to one who never took possession he was not guilty of larceny.[29] And one who states to a pound-keeper that a certain animal in the pound is his, and sells it to the pound-keeper, who himself takes it out and turns it into his range, where it is afterward claimed by the rightful owner, is not thereby guilty of larceny.[30] But where in such a case the purchaser takes the property so sold into his own possession in good faith, the seller is guilty of larceny, since the purchaser takes as his innocent agent, and the act of the purchaser amounts to a taking by the seller.[31]

20. Thus where defendant after shooting a hog took hold of it and cut its throat it is sufficient (Kemp v. State, 89 Ala. 52, 7 So. 413; Croom v. State, 71 Ala. 14); and where the animal is wholly or partly skinned the larceny is complete (Lundy v. State, 60 Ga. 143; Wilburn v. Territory, 10 N. M. 402, 62 Pac. 968; State v. Gilbert, 68 Vt. 188, 34 Atl. 697; Rex v. Rawlins, 2 East P. C. 617).

21. Thus it has been held that shooting a hog, turning it upon its back, and cutting its throat (Williams v. State, 63 Miss. 58), or shooting a hog and skinning one of its hams, leaving the skin attached to the animal (State v. Alexander, 74 N. C. 232), or the mere shooting of a cow and cutting off her ears, there being no value to ears (State v. Butler, 65 N. C. 309), is not a sufficient asportation.

22. Shooting and skinning an animal is certainly enough to constitute a taking. Musquez v. State, 41 Tex. 226; McPhail v. State, 9 Tex. App. 164. Merely killing an animal may or may not be a sufficient taking; but in case of an animal running at large it seems that killing the animal is enough. Coombes v. State, 17 Tex. App. 259 [overruling Martin v. State, 44 Tex. 172; Hall v. State, 41 Tex. 287]. But even in Texas evidence that defendant shot and wounded another's hog, and pursued it some distance, but did not kill or catch it, does not show a sufficient taking. Minter v. State, 26 Tex. App. 217, 9 S. W. 561. Branding a cow for the purpose of appropriating it is sufficient taking, since it cannot be accomplished without actual manual possession. Coward v. State, 24 Tex. h. Severance From Former Possessor. Nor is possession obtained until the goods are completely severed from the possession and control of the owner.[32]

3. Taking Under Process. A constable or other officer who makes use of void process to get possession of property with intent to steal it, and not to take it for the satisfaction of a debt under process of law, is guilty of larceny.[33]

4. Asportation. Larceny requires not merely a taking possession, but also a carrying away or asportation, of the thing taken. Even though possession is taken there can be no larceny without asportation.[34] Nevertheless a bare removal from the place where the goods are found is a sufficient taking and carrying away.[35]

B. By Whom the Goods May Be Taken — 1. No Larceny by a Possessor — a. General Rule. To constitute larceny there must be a trespass in the original taking. One who has acquired possession bona fide cannot thereafter commit larceny of the thing so possessed.[36]

32. Where goods are tied by a string, the picking of them up and carrying as far as the string permits is not an asportation, for so long as the string is not broken the possession of the owner continues. And so the taking of an overcoat from a dummy which is still fastened to the dummy by a chain, the dummy itself being fastened to the building by a string, is not sufficient asportation to constitute larceny. b. Retention of Possession by Vendor. On the same principle, where an owner of property assigned it to another, but retained possession and afterward converted it to his own use, this was not larceny.[37]

c. Partners, Joint Owners, or Croppers. So a partner cannot commit larceny of partnership property.[38] This is equally true, although the partner has sold out all his interest in the property to his copartner, and is under obligation to hand over to him the specific property in question.[39] So in general a joint owner or tenant in common cannot be guilty of larceny, by taking and disposing of the whole property to his own use, unless he takes it out of the hands of a bailee, with whom it was left for safe custody, and the effect of such taking would be to charge the bailee.[40] And the same principle applies in the case of a "cropper,"

Wrongful retention of property acquired bona fide.— The rule applies where possession of the chattels was taken bona fide and reasonably, although without the consent of the owner. As where the prisoner, assisting at a fire, took away goods from the burning house without the expressed desire of the owner, and afterward converted them, it was no larceny. Rex v. Leigh, 2 East P. C. 694, 1 Leach C. C. 411 note. So where one is intrusted with money to take away and get changed, if he takes it bona fide but later converts it to his own use he is not guilty of larceny. Mobley v. State, 114 Ga. 544, 40 S. or person who takes land to cultivate, sharing the crop with the owner of the land. The cropper is in possession of the crop, and does not commit larceny by withholding the owner's share.[41] If on the other hand an agricultural servant is employed to make a crop, and he is to receive a share of the crop by way of wages, he has neither title nor possession of the crop; and if he takes any part of it prior to the division with intent to steal it he is guilty of larceny.[42]

d. Other Instances. Other applications of the rule are given in the notes hereto.[43]

e. Determination of Bailment by Misuse. A theory once prevailed that where property was bailed for a certain limited purpose, its misuse for another purpose determined the bailment, constituted larcenous taking, and made the bailee guilty of larceny. It has been so held in the case of agistment of cattle,[44] and letting a horse to drive to a certain place.[45] But this notion was abandoned, and the general rule as heretofore stated applies to all kinds of bailments.[46]

f. Breaking Bulk. Where chattels are taken in good faith by a bailee, and he afterward breaks bulk and takes part of them with intent to steal, he commits larceny.[47] It is properly confined to a case where there is a package, such as a bale, composed of several chattels inclosed in an outer covering and there is an actual breaking of the outer covering. In such a case the taking of one or any portion of the inclosed chattels is universally held to be larceny.[48] The doctrine has, however, been extended in several jurisdictions to cover a case where several articles are bailed simultaneously and the bailee takes one of the articles, or a quantity of some substance is bailed and part only of it taken.[49] In England some

A shopman gave a customer two shillings in change, whereupon the latter expressing a preference for four sixpences pretended to throw the two shillings back into the till, really returning only one, but receiving other change. This was not larceny of the shilling, it not having been returned to the possession of the shopman. Reg. v. Williams, 7 Cox C. C. 355. Where one has a creditor sign a receipt which the debtor lays down before him and the debtor immediately picks up the receipt and walks off without paying the debt, the receipt has never been in the possession of the creditor so as to make the taking larceny. countenance has been given to this extension of the doctrine,[50] but the prevailing view seems to be otherwise.[51] If the outer covering is broken it is larceny to take the whole contents.[52] If the bailee has a right to open the package his opening it is not breaking bulk, and his opening it and converting all the goods is not larceny.[53]

2. Larceny by Custodian — a. Introductory Statement. Possession in one person is quite consistent with actual manual control in another. Where the possessor of goods places the goods in the hands of another, intending, however, himself to retain the actual or potential control, either by remaining present himself or by retaining the control through his servant, he remains in possession of the goods, and the actual holder of the goods is termed the custodian.

b. Giving Money to Change or Count. When one hands to another money to be changed for other money on the spot, the former does not part with the possession, but only the custody of the money until the transaction is completed; and if the other takes the money with felonious intent without returning the right change he is guilty of larceny.[54] Where the change is taken the possession both of the money and the change passes.[55] If on the other hand the owners of the bill intrust it to another to take away to get changed and to return with the change, the possession of the bill is intrusted to him; and if he afterward makes off with it, it is not larceny but breach of trust.[56] So where one permits another to take money to count in his presence and then hand back, the possession remains in the owner; and if the other, being a mere custodian, feloniously appropriates the money he is guilty of larceny.[57]

c. Cash Sales. Where parties are engaged in a cash sale the whole transaction is incomplete until the payment is completed; and the possession of the goods remains in the seller and that of the money in the buyer until they are simultaneously exchanged. If in such case the buyer gets control of the goods

Money was obtained by defendant on the pretense of cashing a check and he then made off with both money and check; it was held larceny. Grunson v. State, 89 Ind. 533, 46 Am. Rep. 178. This doctrine was carried to an unjustifiable extreme where a firm agreed to lay a quantity of steam pipes for a farmer and permitted the latter to haul to his farm the master, and the servant has custody only.[61] This was probably otherwise originally.[62] The present rule was settled by an English statute which was thought in later times to be merely declaratory of the common law.[63] But the master may give his servant not merely the custody of money or other property, but also the title to it. In such a case if the servant appropriates the money or goods to his own use the act is not larceny. This is the case of a bailiff, who is an accountable party and not a mere custodian of the money he handles.[64] So where a servant receives money to expend about the master's business and render an account, an appropriation of the money is not larceny.[65]

(II) Goods Given to Servant by a Third Person. On the other hand a servant has "possession" as distinguished from "custody" of goods received from a third person for his master until he delivers them to his master, or has put his master into possession by depositing them in a receptacle provided by the master for that purpose.[66]

(III) Goods Placed in the Master's Receptacle. When a servant, having received goods from a third person, places them in a receptacle provided by the master to receive them, the possession vests at once in the master; and if the servant afterward takes out and converts the goods he is guilty of larceny. Thus when the servant is sent with the master's cart to receive goods from a third person for the master, the cart is the receeptacle provided by the master for the purpose, and when the servant places the goods in the cart as directed the possession vests in the master; if the servant afterward feloniously takes the goods from Instances.— If a servant appropriates to his own use bank-bills obtained by him at a bank on a check drawn by his master it is an embezzlement and not a larceny. Com. v. King, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 284; Rex v. Walsh, 2 Leach C. C. 1054, R. & R. 161, 4 Taunt. 258. And where a servant is sent to get a note changed and makes off with the change it is not larceny, for the change never came into the possession of the master. Rex v. Sullens, 1 Moody C. C. 129. So where money is paid to a servant for his master, even though he is not authorized to receive it, and he feloniously appropriates the money, it is not larceny, since he received possession. State v. Johnson, 49 Iowa 141; Rex v. Hawtin, 7 C. & P. 281, 32 E. C. L. 613. Where a teller at a bank receives a deposit and does not put it into the proper place in the bank but appropriates it to his own use, it is not larceny, for the deposit came into possession of the teller and never reached the possession of the bank. Rex v. Bazley, 2 East P. C. 571, 2 Leach C. C. 835; Rex v. Waite, 2 East P. C. 570, 1 Leach C. C. 28. So it has been held that where a servant who was employed to sell goods sold some and immediately appropriated the money, this was not larceny. Reg. v. Betts, Bell C. C. 90, 8 Cox C. C. 140, 5 Jur. N. S. 274, 28 L. J. M. C. 69, 7 Wkly. Rep. 239.

Decisions having opposite tendency.— In one or two cases the rule seems to have been carried to an unjustifiable extreme. Where the servant of a bank received a bundle of canceled checks from the bank messenger of the company and abstracted and destroyed one of them, it being his duty to keep them for his employers, it was held that when given into his custody they had reached their ultimate destination and were in the constructive possession of the owners, and the abstraction of one with fraudulent intent was held larceny. Reg. v. Watts, 4 Cox C. C. 336, 2 Den. C. C. 14, 14 Jur. 870, 19 L. J. M. C. 192, T. & M. 342. And similarly in a Minnesota case. Under a statute making the offense of stealing railroad passenger tickets larceny it was held that a conductor might be indicted for appropriating tickets sold and issued by the company and taken up by the conductor, such tickets, after being thus taken up, coming into the possession of the the cart he is guilty of larceny.[67] In the same way when the master sends the servant with a boat to get the goods, the possession at once vests in the master when the goods are placed in the boat.[68] And if a clerk or other servant receives money for his master in the course of business and places it in his master's safe or cash drawer the possession vests in the master, and if the servant afterward feloniously appropriates the money he is guilty of larceny.[69] A limitation of the rule is recognized where the servant places the goods in the receptacle provided by the master not in the course of the master's business but for his own convenience as a handy hiding-place, not intending to relinquish them to his master but appropriating them at the time to his own purposes; under these circumstances the possession does not vest in the master, and the servant afterward taking the goods away does not commit larceny.[70]

(IV) Goods Deposited on Master's Premises. Where a servant received hay from a third person for his master and unloaded it at the door of his master's stable preparatory to putting it in the hay-loft, and afterward carried it away for himself this was larceny, for the hay was put into the master's possession by being unloaded in front of his stable.[71]

(V) Goods Given to a Servant by a Fellow-Servant. When a servant receives goods from a fellow-servant for the purposes of the master, he gets possession or mere custody according as the servant who gave him the goods had possession or mere custody. So where a third party gives a servant money for his master, and the servant hands it to another servant who misappropriates it, this is not larceny, for the money had not yet been reduced to the possession of the master.[72] On the other hand, if the first servant had the property from the master to guard, the second servant commits larceny.[73]

(VI) Existence of the Relation. Whether or not the relation of master and servant subsists is a question of fact in each particular case, to be decided by the jury in a doubtful case.[74] A servant in the employment of two persons, as

Who are not servants.— One employed to do piece-work at home is not a servant; he is a bailee of the material given to him to work on at home, and if he converts it to his own use he is not guilty of larceny. Reg. v. Saward, 5 Cox C. C. 295; Reg. v. Harris, 5 Cox C. C. 151. Where an employee appropriates to his own use money intrusted to him for safe-keeping by his employer, it not being part of his regular duty to take charge partners, must be considered as the servant of each.[75] A person may be a servant, although employed only for a single transaction.[76] Where a workman is sent by his fellows to their employer to get their pay and after receiving it he appropriated it to his own use, he is not the servant of the employer in this transaction, but that of his fellows, and he cannot be convicted of larceny from his employer.[77] A servant may deal with property of his master in a way that is entirely outside the scope of his service; and in that case the ordinary rules as between master and servant do not apply.[78]

b. Taking by a Servant — (I) Taking Constitutes Larceny. A servant who has merely custody of his master's goods may by feloniously taking them for himself be guilty of larceny.[79]

(II) What Constitutes a Taking — (A) In General. Where goods of the master are in the servant's custody, any act of the servant which is inconsistent with the master's retaining the possession of them is sufficient to constitute a taking of possession by the servant; and if the other elements of the crime are present it will be an act of larceny.[80] Where, however, the servant, although of his employer's money, this is not larceny. The money was delivered to him not as a servant but as a friend. State v. Fann, 65 N. C. 317. A person who is employed to get orders for goods and to receive payment for them, but who is at liberty to get the orders and receive the money where and when he thinks proper, being paid by a commission on the goods sold, is not a servant. Employee of treasury or bank.— One who is intrusted by the treasurer of the United States mint with a specific sum of money to be paid out on an order drawn by the director and indorsed by the treasurer is guilty of larceny if he appropriates the money to his own use, he being but a servant, and the possession of the money remaining in the treasurer. Com. v. Hutchinson, 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 384. (D) Servant Employed to Take Care of Goods. Where a servant is employed to guard or otherwise take care of goods, and he appropriates some of the goods, he is guilty of larceny; having custody merely of the goods and not possession. Thus a clerk in a store is guilty of larceny if he feloniously appropriates goods from the store[85] or money.[86] So a brakeman on a train who feloniously takes goods under transportation commits larceny,[87] and an agent of an express company who takes fraudulently money lying in the company's safe waiting to be delivered is guilty of larceny.[88] So a hostler who feloniously appropriates a horse in his charge is guilty of larceny.[89] And the custodian of a building who takes goods feloniously from the building is guilty of larceny.[90] And where a letter carrier feloniously appropriates a letter given him to deliver he is guilty of larceny.[91]

4. Larceny by a Guest. Like a servant a guest has custody only, not possession, of his host's property handed to him for use by the host; and if he takes the property with intent to steal, he is guilty of larceny.[92]

5. Larceny by Wife or Husband — a. At Common Law. At common law the relation of husband and wife was considered so identical that neither could steal from the other, and the delivery of goods to a third party by the wife negatived any trespass and hence could not be larceny. The stealing by a woman of her husband's goods did not amount to a felony at common law.[93] On this ground another woman who acts with the wife in fraudulently taking his goods is not guilty of larceny.[94] Even while eloping with an adulterer the wife herself cannot steal her husband's goods.[95] Under the law of community between husband and wife which prevails in California and other western states the wife has no control over her husband's possession; and one who knowing the facts takes with her consent is nevertheless guilty of larceny.[96]

b. Under Married Women's Property Acts. Under statutes giving a married woman separate title to her own personal property, it is held in some jurisdictions that the common-law rule is unchanged; and therefore that a husband cannot commit larceny of his wife's separate property.[97] But the opposite view is taken in other jurisdictions.[98]

6. Larceny by Wife's Paramour. Receipt from the wife of the husband's goods by an adulterer or one intending to elope with her and live in adultery with her is larceny from the husband.[99] But the prisoner must have taken some active part either in carrying away or disposing of the goods taken.[1] Selling of goods by him is sufficient.[2] The fact that defendant was in the husband's service and acted under the wife's directions affords no defense.[3] A wife's clothes are her husband's property, and it is as much larceny for the adulterer to take them as any other property belonging to the husband.[4] One who assists a wife to carry away her husband's property and is afterward found living in adultery with her, using the property in common, may be convicted of larceny.[5] Since a wife cannot steal her husband's goods, the adulterer cannot be indicted for receiving stolen goods when he receives from her goods taken from her husband.[6] If, however, he receives them from someone other than the wife, he may well be guilty of receiving stolen property.[7]

7. Larceny by Owner. The owner of goods who has the right to possession cannot commit larceny of them by taking them from a possessor, even if he takes it by fraud or force.[8] He may, however, be guilty of larceny by taking the goods from the possession of a bailee in two cases: If the owner takes his goods from a bailee clandestinely with intent to charge the bailee with the value, he is guilty of larceny.[9] And if the bailee has a lien on the property, or an interest in it which he has a right to protect by retaining possession, it is larceny for the owner to take it away with intent to steal.[10] So it is larceny for a pledgor of goods to take them from the pledgee,[11] or for the owner to take them from one who is rightfully holding them on a lien[12] with intent to deprive the possessor of his interest. If the animus furandi is lacking there is of course no larceny under these circumstances.[13] The fact that the taker has a claim on the goods will not make it any the less larceny if he takes them from the possession of the owner with intention to deprive him of his interest. Thus where a "cropper," paid by a share of the crop, takes the whole crop from the owner's possession with felonious intent he is guilty of larceny.[14]

C. Acquisition of Title — 1. In Absence of Special Statutory Provisions — a. Statement of Rule. If the owner or the possessor who has actual or apparent authority to deal with the title of goods intends to pass the title and not merely the possession of the goods to a person whose intent in taking them is felonious, the act of taking is not larceny.[15] It is not necessary that the intention should be to pass title to the person who obtains the property. If that person pretends to be a servant or agent and to be obtaining it for a master or principal and the giver intends the title to pass to the latter the transaction does not constitute larceny.[16] But in order to prevent larceny the title must be intended to pass

16. It will be noticed in such a case that the title does not pass at all, since the person to whom it was intended to pass it is not really concerned in the transaction; the fact that the owner intends to deal with the title

at the time of the transaction; if possession alone is then passed, with permission that the taker should later assume title to the property, or part of it, the taking, if fraudulent and with intent to steal, is larceny.[17] And if upon a sale it is agreed that the title shall not pass until full payment is made the fraudulent purchaser is guilty of larceny.[18]

b. Extent and Limits of Rule. Where one has deposited a stake on a bet, and being fraudulently led to believe that he has lost the bet allows it to be paid over to his opponent, there is no larceny because he intends to pass the title.[19] And the same is the case where a sale of a chattel is intended, although induced by fraud, since the seller intends to pass the title the buyer is not guilty of larceny.[20] So where a loan of money is obtained by fraud, since the title is intended to pass in case of a loan of money the borrower is not guilty of larceny.[21] Other applications of the rule are set out in the notes.[22] On the other hand since a mere bailee in giving up the goods does not affect the title to them, one who obtains possession from a bailee by fraud may be guilty of larceny.[23]

2. Under Statutes Making Obtaining Property by False Pretenses Larceny. It is very common by statute to make the crime of obtaining goods by false pretenses larceny; and in that case of course larceny is committed, although the title passes.[24]

D. From Whom the Goods May Be Taken — 1. Taking Must Be From a Possessor. Since the thief is required to take possession, it follows that if larceny is committed the thief must take from some person who was previously in possession. All personal chattels which are not abandoned are supposed by the law to be in the possession of some person, and if such possession is not actual, a possessor must be found by construction of law. One having once taken possession of a chattel remains in possession, although it is out of his actual custody, until someone else takes possession.[25] Cattle running at large are in the possession of the owner.[26] So is an estray.[27] And if the estray joins a flock of animals belonging to another without his knowledge, the possession continues in the owner of the estray.[28] A shipper for whom a grain-car has been brought to a station, but who has not yet been notified of its arrival, has no possession of the car; and one who takes the car does not take from him or deprive him of it.[29] The fact that the possessor of a chattel has no right to it does not make it any the less a subject of larceny.[30] Since a servant has no possession, one who illegally or fraudulently induces a servant to give him the master's goods is guilty of larceny from the master.[31]

2. Larceny of Lost Goods — a. Possession of Lost Goods. The law places the possession of lost chattels in the loser until they are taken into the actual possession of a finder.[32] If property is left behind by its owner in a shop, or other place to which the owner is likely to return to find it, it is often said to be not lost but mislaid, and therefore to be in the owner's possession; but no difference between mislaid property and property actually lost seems to exist in this respect.[33]

Where property is placed in a receptacle, like a desk or box, and the receptacle is taken by one who is ignorant of the fact that the property is contained in it, the possession of the property does not pass with that of the receptacle, but remains in the person who placed it there.[34] Where the owner abandons property, that is, leaves it for any one who chooses to take it, he ceases to be in possession; and a taker is not infringing the possession of any one, and therefore does not commit larceny.[35] Animals running at large are in the possession of their owner, and so is an estray.[36]

b. Goods Found Without Clue to Ownership. If goods are found under such circumstances that there is absolutely no clue to the ownership, that is, no reasonable expectation that the owner will find the goods, the finder has a legal right to take the goods for his own use.[37] If therefore a finder of goods who has no clue to the ownership takes the goods for himself and converts them to his own use he is not guilty of larceny.[38]

c. Goods Found With Clue to Ownership — (I) Effect of Clue. If there is any clue to the ownership of lost property the finder who takes for himself is guilty of larceny.[39]

(II) What Amounts to Clue. A clue to the ownership is any circumstance which will lead the finder to believe that the owner can find his goods again. This may consist of: (1) Some mark on the article itself which would tend to identify the owner. Thus where papers or the owner's card are found in a pocket-book, it affords a clue to the owner.[40] So of a name on a watch.[41] But natural marks on animals, although serving to identify them, do not indicate the ownership, so as to constitute a clue.[42] (2) The place in which the property is found. If the property is found in such a place that it might be inferred that the owner, discovering his loss, would return to look for it, this circumstance of itself constitutes a clue to the ownership. This is the case where money or other property is found in a shop, whether by the shop-keeper himself or by a customer.[43] So where it is found in a vehicle, like a coach,[44] a railway carriage,[45] or a cart;[46] in a dwelling-house;[47] or in a theater.[48] The same is true where a bale or sack is found in a highway, having evidently dropped from a passing vehicle,[49] or on a railroad track, having dropped from a train.[50] So where money is found hidden in the ground within a farm building.[51] Where one accidentally left his purse on an old saddle in a barn, there was held to be a clue to the ownership;[52] and so where he placed a box containing musical instruments near the door of his shop.[53] (3) The nature of the property itself. There may be something in the nature of the property itself, as its unusually great value, or some peculiarity about it, which will indicate to the finder that the owner can probably be found. Thus domestic animals found straying are almost always regarded as possessing a clue to the ownership,[54] and the same thing was true of runaway slaves.[55]

(III) Belief of Finder as to Clue to Ownership. The question whether a clue to the ownership exists does not depend upon the actual facts, but upon the reasonable belief of the finder at the time of finding.[56] If the finder, discovering the clue, takes the article in good faith for the owner he has possession; and if he afterward forms the intent to steal and appropriates the property to his own use he is not guilty of larceny, since he was already in possession at the time of forming the intent to steal.[57] So where one receives a letter apparently addressed to him, and upon opening it finds that it contains money intended for another, and converts the money to his own use, it is not larceny, since the original taking was innocent.[58]

d. Withholding For a Reward. When the finder of lost property, although he may know or have a clue to the owner, merely detains it temporarily in the hope of obtaining a reward, he is not guilty of larceny.[59] If on the other hand the intention of the finder is to return it only in case a reward is offered and given to him, he is guilty of larceny in the taking.[60]

e. Larceny From Finder. The finder of lost property is the possessor and also substantial owner thereof as against any one except the true owner, and where the finder delivers the property to defendant's wife on her representation that it was probably defendant's, but that if it was not it would be returned, and defendant falsely claimed and converted the property, he was guilty of larceny.[61] of the owner; and therefore a taking by consent of the owner or possessor, although the taker had a felonious intent at the time of taking, is not larceny.[62]

2. Joint Owners. So consent of any one of several joint owners prevents a taking of goods from being larceny.[63]

3. Consent of a Bailee. This consent to the taking by one who is in actual possession as a bailee is sufficient to prevent the taking being larceny, without regard to the consent of the bailor or owner.[64]

4. Consent of a Custodian. Where the taker has the consent of a servant or other custodian of the property to the taking the question whether the consent prevents the taking from being larceny depends upon the authority of the custodian to give such consent on behalf of the owner. The consent of a custodian who has authority from the possessor to pass the possession is sufficient to prevent a taking from being larceny.[65] Where the goods are in the mere custody of a servant or other person who is not actually or apparently authorized by the possessor to pass the possession, his consent to a taking will not prevent the taking from being larceny.[66] This is true if the custodian is defrauded into giving consent.[67] It is equally larceny if the custodian colludes with the taker.[68]

B. Consent Obtained by Force or Fear. A pretended consent obtained by force or threat of force, and therefore extorted from the fears of the owner, is not a real consent, and does not prevent a taking from being larceny.[69] The threat of bringing a civil action is not such compulsion as will make the owner's consent void.[70] Nor will threat of exposure,[71] nor of prosecution.[72] The compulsion must involve physical fear; the compulsion of mere mental distress will not neutralize the consent of the owner.[73]

C. Consent Obtained by Fraud — 1. General Doctrine of Larceny by Trick — a. Statement of Rule. If the consent of the owner to the taking is obtained by fraud it will not prevent the taking from being larceny. If one obtains possession of goods from the owner or possessor by fraud with intent to steal the taking is larceny,[74] as is now held in every jurisdiction.[75]

3. Fault of the Victim. The fact that the victim lost his property while himself engaged in an illegal transaction does not prevent the offense from being committed.[85]

D. Mistake. If a chattel has been delivered and received under a mutual mistake as to its character, a subsequent misappropriation by the recipient will not constitute larceny. Thus where one is given by mistake a larger sum of money than he is entitled to, and afterward, discovering the mistake, he keeps it for himself, his act is not larceny.[86] In some jurisdictions it has been held that if the wrong-doer is given goods under a mistake, which he knows at the time of taking, he is guilty of larceny, although he did nothing to induce the mistaken act, and therefore did not secure the goods by a trick. Thus if one is overpaid by mistake, and receives the money knowing of the mistake, he has been held guilty of larceny.[87] But since the consent of the owner is freely given, without any wrongful inducement used by defendant, some courts hold that no larceny is committed under such circumstances.[88]

E. Submission. If the owner tacitly permits the taking by knowing of it and failing to object, his consent prevents the act from being larceny.[89] And mere failure to resist because the act is so sudden as to give no time for resistance does not prevent the taking from being larceny.[90]

F. Entrapment — 1. Acquiescence For Detection. If the owner of property facilitates the taking of the property for the purpose of securing the detection and punishment of the taker his act does not amount to consent to the taking and larceny is committed by the taker. Thus the fact that the owner stands by and does not prevent the taking does not prevent the act from being larceny.[91] Nor does the further fact that the owner so places the property or takes such other steps as to facilitate the taking.[92] So it is larceny to steal the contents of a decoy letter, placed in the mail for the purpose of detecting a mail-clerk.[93] The fact that an agent of the owner acts as a supposed confederate of the thief is no defense to the latter, provided the original design was formed independently of such agent.[94] So where a detective employed by the owner acts with the thief, the taking is none the less larceny.[95] And so where a person approached by the thief as his confederate notifies the owner or the public authorities, and, being authorized by them to do so, assists the thief in carrying out the plan, the larceny is nevertheless committed.[96]

2. Solicitation of the Thief. If, however, the owner, personally or by his agent, solicits the accused to take the property, the taking is plainly by his own procurement and consent, and the taking is therefore not larceny.[97] And if the pretended accomplice himself takes the goods, the wrong-doer being present abetting and afterward receiving the goods, there is no criminal taking and therefore no larceny.[98] The pretended accomplice, not having a felonious intent, is not guilty of larceny.[99] But where a private detective, without concert with the owner, induced a thief to steal goods in order himself to get a reward which had been offered him by the owner, he has been held a guilty party.[1]

G. Conditional Consent. If the owner of goods authorizes another to take possession under certain conditions, or for a certain purpose, this is not a consent that the goods shall be taken otherwise; and if they are so taken with intent to steal the act is larceny.[2] Similarly it is a well settled doctrine that the consent

V. INTENT TO STEAL.[4]

A. Necessity of Intent. An essential element in the crime of larceny is that the thief should have the felonious intent, the intent to steal or animus furandi, that is, the intent to deprive the owner feloniously and permanently of his property, at the time of the taking of possession.[5] So a special verdict under

The carrier was directed to go and take a certain bale to carry to Southampton: he took it for himself and converted it to his own use, and his act was held to be larceny.

an indictment for larceny must find the intent.[6] If such an intent does not exist at the time of the taking, neither its formation afterward nor any subsequent appropriation of the property can make the larceny complete.[7] The question whether the animus furandi existed at the time of taking is a question for the jury.[8] One can have the intent to deprive the owner of his property without knowing who he is.[9] An open taking has been held to raise a presumption of fact against the existence of felonious intent, to be rebutted by clear proof.[10] If a felonious intent exists at the time of the taking, larceny is committed, although at some period subsequent to the taking defendant came to the conclusion that it was his own property.[11]

B. Nature of Intent — 1. Definition of Animus Furandi. The intent to steal is the intention to take the goods of another as a thief takes, and thereby to deprive the owner permanently of the use of them. To take goods with a fraudulent purpose to take the property of another and a consciousness of no right to take them is a sufficient definition of felonious intent.[12] The elements of animus furandi have been thus stated: The thing must be taken without any fair claim of right, with the intent to appropriate so far as to deprive the owner of it permanently, knowingly, or with the bona fide belief that the taking is against the owner's consent and intended disposal of the thing.[13]

2. The Felonious Purpose — a. In General. The purpose of the taking must be felonious; that is, it must be such a purpose as actuates a thief. If the purpose of taking property is to exact payment of money from the owner, it is or is not larceny of the property so taken according as the property is to be withheld permanently unless the money is paid, or is to be returned at all events.[14] If on the other hand the taking is to be permanent unless the money is paid the taking is larceny.[15] The same doctrine applies where one takes goods with the intent that the owner shall have them again, but only by buying them back.[16]

b. Taking to Pledge or to Obtain Reward. Taking the property of another

It was at one time held in North Carolina that if the taking was open there could under no conditions be larceny.— The taking, it was said, must be done fraudulently and secretly, so as not only to deprive the owner of his property, but also to attempt to leave him without knowledge of the taker. Illustration.—Where a workman is paid according to the amount of work he does, and his finished material is kept in one place to mark the amount of wages due but is at all times in possession of the master, the servant having no lien upon it, the servant who wrongfully takes from the master to place with the material he has worked on is not guilty of larceny, since the purpose of the taking is merely temporary. Reg. v. Holloway, 2 C. & K. 942, 3 Cox C. C. 241, 13 Jur. 86, 18 L. J. M. C. 60, 3 New Sess. Cas. 410, T. & M. 40, 61 E. C. L. 942; Reg. v. Poole, 7 Cox C. C. 373, Dears. & B. 345, 27 L. J. M. 15. As for instance in a similar case to the one stated in the preceding note, if the workman has a lien on the product for his wages. Fort v. State, 82 Ala. 50, 2 So. 477. So where defendant, an employee in a foundry, was paid by the amount of iron which ran out of the furnace, and to increase this quantity he threw into the furnace an iron axle belonging to his employers, it was held to be larceny, the axle being thereby destroyed. Reg. v. Richards, 1 C. & K. 532, 47 E. C. L. 532.

16. Thus where a servant of a tallow-chandler took a quantity from his master's warehouse and placed it on the scales, saying it came from a butcher whose pretended servant at once appeared to be paid for it, this was held larceny, for there was the intent to deprive the master of his tallow if he should not pay for it. Reg. v. Hall, 3 Cox C. C. 245. So taking railway tickets with intent to use is not the less larceny because they are ultimately to be returned to the railway company, since they are returned only in consideration of a ride. with intent to pledge the same amounts to taking animo furandi, if there be no reasonable likelihood of ability to redeem or if the intention to redeem be only a vague and indefinite one.[17] But one who pledges borrowed property with the intention of redeeming and restoring it to the owner, and having a fair and reasonable expectation of so doing, is not guilty of larceny.[18] To take property with intent to hold until a reward is offered and then to claim the reward is taking animo furandi, for there is the intent to deprive the owner of his property unless and until a reward is paid.[19] But to take property with the intention of returning it, merely hoping for a reward, is not a felonious taking and hence not larceny.[20]

c. Taking to Destroy Evidence. One who takes to destroy the property lest it be used as evidence against him takes animo furandi.[21]

d. Taking For Illegal Purpose Other Than Theft. But a taking, not to deprive the owner, but for some purpose which, although it may be illegal, is not that of theft, is not a felonious taking.[22]

e. Taking For True Owner. If one entirely without right takes property from one who is in possession of it in order to return it to the true owner, or one whom he believes to be such, he is not guilty of larceny.[23]

f. Taking From a Drunken Companion. Taking property from a drunken companion to keep for him is not larceny.[24] causes the taking can be shown in disproof of the intent to steal. An unintentional taking is not larceny.[26] And where one takes property similar to his own, under the belief that it is his own, he is not guilty.[27] So where one takes public records under the belief that they are old paper he does not take with intent to steal records.[28]

h. Taking With Intention of Purchasing. If without the knowledge or consent of the owner, but with the belief that he will be willing to sell, one takes goods with the intention of regularly paying for them, there is no felonious intent and therefore no larceny.[29] The intended purchase, however, must be fair and bona fide. The taking of property with the intent of purchasing it from the owner at a price less than its value, and of concealing and retaining it until such purchase could be effected, is larceny.[30]

i. Borrowing Without Permission. Where one without permission borrows goods of another intending and having the power to restore or replace them, the taking, although wrongful, does not constitute larceny.[31]

j. Taking Under Bona Fide Belief in Ownership or Authority. Since one who takes what he believes to be his has not the intent of a thief, a bona fide claim of right to take is incompatible with an intent to steal; and one who takes under a bona fide claim of right to do so is not guilty of larceny.[32] So one who takes

34. Taking money to pay a debt.— Taking money with intent to appropriate it to the payment of a debt due to the taker from the party from whom it is taken is unlawful; but if it is done under an honest belief of the legal right to do so, it does not constitute larceny. Johnson v. State, 73 Ala. 523; Com. v. Stebbins, 8 Gray (Mass.) 492; Young v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. 290, 30 S. W. 238; Wolf v. State, 14 Tex. App. 210. State v. Williams, 95 Mo. 247, 8 S. W. 217, 6 Am. St. Rep. 46. In the absence, however, of a bona fide belief in the right to do so, taking money to apply it to the payment of a debt is larceny. Taking a bird-cage as wanton mischief for the purpose of retaliation;[38] catching a chicken and making it squall for sport merely, to annoy the owner;[39] opening a letter from idle curiosity;[40] or taking warrants from the possession of a bailiff, with the intent of depriving him of his authority,[41] does not constitute larceny. So where a detective accompanied a thief, pretending to be his accomplice, and apparently has a part in the taking, he is not guilty of larceny because the felonious intent is lacking.[42] But where, without concert with the

Com. v. Weld, Thach. Cr. Cas. (Mass.) 157. So a taking of lightning rods openly, and under a claim of right existing by virtue of the provisions of a written contract by which the rods were put up, does not constitute a theft. owner, he induces a thief to steal goods, in order himself to get a reward which had been offered by the owner, he has been held guilty.[43] On the other hand servants who took without authority a quantity of beans from their master to feed his horses were held guilty of larceny, for there was the intent to deprive the master of his property, although applied to feeding his horses.[44] This is a rather questionable decision.

3. Permanent Taking. There is no animus furandi without an intention of depriving the owner permanently in a fair sense. The wrongful taking of the personal property of another for a mere temporary purpose is not larceny.[45] Thus if one illegally takes another's horse to ride, with the intention of leaving it within a reasonable distance for the owner to take it, there is no intention to steal.[46] A fortiori taking with the intention of temporarily using the horse and then returning it is not larceny.[47] The temporary taking of a horse to facilitate escape, intending to turn it loose within a reasonable distance, is not larceny.[48] If, however, the horse is to be turned loose under such circumstances that the owner will not be likely to recover it, the taking is larceny.[49] Taking a skiff to evade arrest, and carrying along a friend to return it, is not larceny.[50] And similarly the taking of a guard's pistol by escaping convicts, which they directed to be returned to him, is not larceny.[51] Other instances of temporary taking are set out in the notes.[52] intent required for larceny is not necessarily an intent to gain advantage for defendant; an intention to deprive the owner of his property is enough.[53] But in a few cases it is held necessary to show that defendant took for his own purpose or lucri causa; a phrase borrowed from the Roman law.[54]

c. Incapacity to Form Intent. If a person is incapable of forming an intent to steal he cannot be guilty of larceny. Thus a child too young to form an intent to steal cannot be guilty of larceny.[55] A person who is incapable by reason of intoxication of forming an intent to steal is not guilty of larceny.[56] Mere drunkenness, however, does not prevent the existence of the intent or the commission of the crime,[57] and the fact that on prior occasions of intoxication defendant was bereft of reason is immaterial.[58]

VI. DEFENSES.[59]

A. Personal Defenses.[60] An alien enemy is not punishable for taking property as an act of war.[61] A person who is so insane as not to be able to govern his acts cannot be convicted; therefore kleptomania, if proved, is a defense to a charge of theft.[62] A deaf and dumb person is not by reason of his infirmities incapable of committing crime, but may be proved to be of sufficient capacity to be guilty of larceny.[63]

B. Disposition of the Property. What disposition the thief made of the property is immaterial, and no dealing with the property after the taking can destroy or in any way affect his guilt. Thus a return of the property is no defense.[64] Neither is an agreement to return it,[65] nor a condonation of the theft by the owner of the goods, upon an agreement to treat the thief as a debtor.[66] Nor need it be shown that the thief after the taking carried out his felonious intent by converting the goods to his own use.[67]

C. Custom. A custom to take another's property is of itself no defense to a prosecution for larceny.[68] But evidence of such a custom might be admissible as bearing on the bona fides of the taker, and thus disproving the animus furandi.[69]

D. Excuse. Where defendant took a horse with intent to deprive its owner of its value, or a portion thereof, it is immaterial that at the time of the taking the horse was trespassing on defendant's premises.[70]

E. Limitation. Prosecution may be barred by a statute of limitations.[71]

F. Change of Law. If after the commission of an act of larceny the law is so changed as to abolish the provisions making the act criminal, there can be no conviction, even though in place of the repealed law similar provisions were enacted.[72] The repeal should contain a saving clause keeping the old provisions alive for the purpose of punishing infractions of them; and the punishment may then be inflicted under the old provisions.[73] A mere amendment of the old law does not prevent punishment under unamended provisions of the old law.[74]

VII. RESTITUTION OF STOLEN PROPERTY.

A. Right of Owner to Restitution — 1. Under the English Practice. Under the English practice the owner of stolen goods has no action for their recovery until he has successfully prosecuted the thief; upon which, by statute, the court has power to issue an order of restitution directing the stolen goods to be returned to the owner, and it will not matter that the stolen property has found its way into the hands of bona fide purchasers. Property ordered restored must be that stolen.[75] The property must be identified at the time of the trial.[76] While the earlier statutes limited the power to order restitution to cases of felonious taking,[77] later statutes extended the rule to cases of false pretenses.[78] A bona fide purchaser of goods obtained by false pretenses is subject to an order for restitution.[79] While it was held under earlier statutes that the power to order restitution could be invoked only when the goods could be returned in specie,[80] yet it has been held under a later statute that the proceeds of stolen property in the hands of the convict or his agent may be ordered restored to the original owner.[81] The jurisdiction of the court of queen's bench to issue a writ of restitution of stolen property was incidental to the judgment on appeals of felony, which were abolished by 59 Geo. III, c. 46, and it was abolished with them.[82] Mandamus will not lie to compel the court to issue an order for restitution,[83] although if an order be made, attachment will be issued for its disobedience.[84] The Forfeiture for Felony Act, 1870 (33 & 54 Vict. c. 23, § 4), which empowers the court to award any sum of money not exceeding £100, by way of satisfaction or compensation for any loss of property suffered by the applicant through or by reason of felony, such sum to be "deemed a judgment-debt to the person entitled to receive the same from the person so convicted," requires to be exercised with considerable caution, as being liable to abuse by arrangements in the nature of condonation of a felony.[85] It was an offense within 4 Geo. I, c. 11, § 4, to take money under pretense of helping a man to goods stolen from him, although the prisoner has no acquaintance with the felon, and did not pretend that he had, although he had no power to apprehend the felon, and although the goods were never restored, and the prisoner had not power to restore them.[86] Similarly under statute 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, § 58, it was held an offense to receive money with an intent to purchase stolen goods from thieves for the owner, not meaning to bring them to justice.[87] By statute also the property in a stolen chattel revests in the owner on the conviction of the thief, and the owner may maintain trover for it, although there has been no order for restitution.[88] The bona fide purchaser of stolen beasts sold in market overt cannot, in answer to a claim for them by the original owner after the conviction of the thief, counter-claim for the cost of their keep while the beasts were in the possession of the purchaser, for they were his own property until, on the conviction, the property revested in the original owner.[89]

2. IN THE UNITED STATES. In the United States generally the owner of stolen property is entitled to have it back irrespective of the conviction of the thief. Identified stolen goods may be recovered even from a bona fide purchaser,[90] but not stolen bank-notes or other money to which an innocent holder gets title.[91]

B. Voluntary Restitution Mitigating Punishment. Restitution has been given a totally different effect by statute in Michigan[92] and in Texas,[93] where complete voluntary restitution of the goods by the thief to the owner operates to reduce the offense from a felony to a misdemeanor. The prisoner cannot invoke the benefit of the statute where the offense includes a burglarious entry made in order to commit the larceny.[94] Restitution must be voluntary, and restitution under threat of prosecution is not voluntary.[95] Nor is return of stolen property after having been caught with it in possession "voluntary" within the statute.[96] The return must not be prompted solely by apprehensions of discovery.[97] If, however, the return is induced by repentance it is enough, although fear of punishment may also constitute a motive.[98] Restitution must be within a reasonable time. Returning property on the evening of the day on which it was stolen is a return within a reasonable time.[99] The identical property must be returned. The statute does not apply where the character of the property has been changed, as from live hogs to pork.[1] Nor will payment for stolen property enable the prisoner to invoke the statute.[2]

VIII. PARTIES.

A. Principal — 1. Principal in the First Degree. The person who with his own hand takes the goods is the principal in the first degree in the crime of larceny.[3] A party who takes no part in the actual larceny and is not present at the time and place of the taking cannot be guilty of the larceny as principal.[4]

2. Joint Principals. Where two or more persons act together in a larceny, each of them doing one part of the whole act, they are joint principals in the crime.[5]

Property changed into money.— The right of the owner of stolen property to a summary restitution thereof, under the Massachusetts statute, is limited to the articles stolen, and does not extend to money into which they have been changed by the thief. Com. v. Boudrie, 4 Gray (Mass.) 418. On a conviction of larceny of money, the court ought not to enter judgment against the prisoner for the amount, nor award an execution in favor of the person from whom it was stolen. In re Henley, 1 Va. Cas. 145. Where money was taken from defendant on a search warrant, but on trial she was found not guilty of larceny, as charged, by finding and appropriating the money, it should be returned to her, and the court cannot retain the case on its docket, and call a jury to determine the ownership of the money, under Code, § 4657, for that only applies where defendant has been found guilty. 3. Principal in the Second Degree. One who, while taking no part in the actual commission of the act, is present aiding and abetting the actual thief, is a principal in the second degree, and is dealt with in the same way as the actual principal.[6] For this reason one cannot be convicted as accessary to larceny where the evidence proves him to have been present aiding and abetting.[7] And where several persons are acting together at the time of taking, it is unnecessary to prove which of them actually took the property, as all are guilty.[8] If the person present at the theft was a party to the plan, and was in a position to give aid, he is a principal.[9] But it is not enough merely to show that defendant was present at the act of larceny; guilty complicity in the act must be shown to make him a principal.[10] And if the parties agreed to do a certain act, and one of them did a different act which amounted to larceny, whether the others present will be principals depends upon whether it naturally grew out of the act intended, so as to be foreseeable.[11] And if a person was party to a plan of theft, but withdrew before the commission of the act, stating to his confederates that he would have nothing to do with it, he is not a party to their subsequent theft.[12] So if one is apparently acting in concert with the participants, but is really acting as agent of the police for their detection, he is not a party.[13] But where a private detective, without concert with the owner, induces a thief to steal goods, in order himself to get

4. Larceny Through an Innocent Agent. One who with felonious intent procures a taking of another's property by means of an innocent agent is himself guilty of the larceny as principal.[15]

B. Accessary Before the Fact. One who encourages or procures the commission of a larceny before it is committed, but is not present at the act, is an accessary before the fact, and must be punished as such.[18] The accessary could not be convicted at common law until after the conviction of the principal, but this has very generally been changed by statute.[19] In the case of a misdemeanor an accessary before the fact is dealt with as a principal; and therefore where petit larceny is a misdemeanor, all parties to it, whether before or at the fact, are principals.[20] And so in North Carolina as to all larcenies, as a result of making them petit larcenies.[21] The same is true of attempts to commit larceny since that is a misdemeanor.[22] And it is common by statute to provide that all parties to a felony, either before or at the fact, shall be principals; when such a statute exists, parties who at common law would be accessaries before the fact to larceny become principals in the theft, and may be convicted as joint participants in the crime.[23]

C. Accessary After the Fact. One who knowing of the theft assists the thief to escape or to make way with his booty is an accessary after the fact to the theft.[24] This, like the offense of being accessary before the fact, is a separate offense; at common law it could be punished only after the conviction of the principal, but under common statutes it may now be punished independently, provided the guilt of the principal is alleged and proved.[25] In some states the offense is merged with that of larceny, accessaries after as well as before the fact being made principals.[26] In other states the accessary after the fact is not made a principal, as the accessary before the fact is, but remains an accessary only as at common law.[27]

D. Receiver of Stolen Goods. Receiving stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, is in its nature an accessorial act, giving aid and comfort to the thief; but it is everywhere by statute created a separate crime. In some jurisdictions it still remains an accessorial act, and may be punished as such notwithstanding the statute.[28] But it is usually held that it can no longer be punished in connection with the larceny,[29] or at least that he is not an "accomplice" in the crime.[30] One cannot be at the same time a thief and a receiver of the stolen property.[31] But the Texas penal code makes receiving stolen property a variety of theft.[32]

not capitally punished. The word "larceny" is a general term, including both grand and petit larceny.[33] By the common law of England grand larceny was the stealing of goods above the value of twelve pence.[34] While the line is differently drawn in this country, the distinction between grand and petit larceny is usually based on the value of the property taken; and the value of the property is therefore a material ingredient in the crime of grand larceny.[35] In some states there is no legal distinction, the phrase "grand larceny" being merely a term in general use to designate a larceny of property over a certain value.[36] Value means market value.[37] The other elements of grand larceny are the same as those of larceny generally; thus, a felonious intent must exist.[38]

2. STATUTORY GRAND LARCENY. In several states aggravated forms of larceny have been designated as grand larceny, without regard to the value of the goods stolen. The legislature has power to designate such acts as grand larceny.[39] The stealing of some domestic animals is often made grand larceny.[40] This means the stealing of a live animal of the sort named, and does not cover stealing the carcass of a dead animal.[41] Larceny from the person is often made grand larceny,[42] and also larceny from a dwelling-house.[43] Larceny in the commission of burglary is grand larceny in Missouri.[44] Other varieties of grand larceny are set out in the notes.[45]

B. Petit Larceny. Petit larceny is often a statutory misdemeanor in this country,[46] but is sometimes a felony.[47] A second offense of petit larceny is, however, usually a felony.[48] In South Carolina at one time the larceny of an animal of less value than twenty dollars was petit larceny.[49]

C. Value of Goods the Criterion. The conviction must be for petit larceny if the prosecution does not affirmatively prove the goods to be above the value required for grand larceny.[50] Some value must be proved, even for petit larceny.[51] The values of articles of property stolen from different owners or even from the same owner at different times cannot be combined to make out an offense of grand larceny.[52]

X. TAKING OF TWO ARTICLES AT ONE TIME.

A. From One Owner. Where several articles are taken from the same owner at or about the same time by the same thief, the better practice, in spite of the fact that there are technically several takings, is to regard the takings as a single offense, and to indict and punish but once. This is clearly the case when the goods are taken at the same time by one act of taking.[53] But it is equally true where the goods, although taken at substantially the same time, are taken independently.[54]

B. From Different Owners. Even if several articles taken at substantially one time are taken from different persons, the act, according to the prevailing view, constitutes but a single theft,[55] although in a few jurisdictions the taking at one time of several articles of different persons may be regarded either as one crime or as distinct crimes.[56]

C. Distinct Takings. If the takings were at substantially different times or places, they constitute distinct offenses, even if the goods belong to the same owner and a fortiori if they belong to different persons.[57]

XI. ATTEMPT TO COMMIT LARCENY.

A. What Constitutes an Attempt. An attempt to commit larceny is criminal at common law.[58] In order to constitute a criminal attempt there must be an intent to steal;[59] and an overt act intended and apparently adapted to carrying out the intent, which must have progressed measurably near to success. Putting a hand in the pocket of the intended victim is enough,[60] and so is opening a cash drawer[61] or ransacking a house.[62] Other instances of common-law attempts are given in the notes.[63] A common provision of penal codes defines criminal attempt as any overt act in pursuance of a criminal intent.[64] A statute punishing an attempt to commit a violent felony covers an attempt to commit larceny from the person, since that involves force.[65]

B. Successful Attempt. It has been held that if an attempted larceny is successful, and the complete crime committed, there can be no conviction for the attempt.[66]

C. Attempt Impossible of Success. An attempt is punishable notwithstanding it may be impossible of success. Thus an attempt to steal by picking a pocket is a crime, although there was in fact nothing in the pocket.[67] So opening and

XII. STATUTORY OFFENSES.

A. Statutory Aggravations of Larceny[71] — 1. INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT. Statutes have been passed in most jurisdictions adding to the common-law offense of larceny new offenses of an aggravated sort, consisting of larceny with some additional element. The general requirements of larceny must exist in these statutory modifications of the offense. Thus the intent to steal must be proved in all statutory aggravations of larceny.[72]

2. LARCENY FROM THE PERSON.[73] Taking from the person is held to mean a taking from the presence[74] or protection,[75] and whether or not there has been such a taking is a question for the jury.[76] The presence of the owner must have been relied upon to guard the goods.[77] Hence property taken from a sleeping[78] or intoxicated[79] person has been held not to be larceny from the person unless the victim has been made drunk to facilitate the theft.[80] The statute defining larceny from the person as grand larceny does not make it necessary that the property should actually be removed from the presence of the person.[81] But one to be guilty of larceny from the person must have secured possession of the goods alleged to have been stolen.[82] The offense is committed only in the place in which

But where one by force drew a watch from another's pocket and the chain from the buttonhole, but the watch-key having been caught by a button the watch and the taking occurs; the thief cannot be prosecuted for this offense in another county into which he takes the goods.[83] The amount of punishment does not depend upon the value of the property taken.[84] There can be no principals in the second degree to this crime, since persons present cannot aid and abet in so personal a matter.[85] Robbery is distinguished from larceny from the person by the elements of force or previously putting in fear. The mere snatching of a thing from the person is larceny,[86] but if force is used to secure the article,[87] or if there is a struggle,[88] the crime is robbery. The use of violence after the taking will not raise the crime to robbery,[89] and the force must be used to overcome resistance, not merely to seize the property.[90] If robbery has been committed, the element of force or fear may be neglected, and the wrong-doer may be indicted and punished for a larceny from the person,[91] or on an indictment for robbery he may be convicted of larceny from the person.[92] No particular kind of larceny is required; the offense may be committed by force, by stealth, or in any other way in which the taking from the personal protection of the possessor can be accomplished.[93]

3. Larceny From Dwelling-House or Other Buildings — a. "Dwelling-House." To constitute this crime the taking must be from a building or an appurtenance thereto.[94] In the following instances the larceny was held to be larceny from a dwelling-house. Larceny from a building within the curtilage of a dwelling,[95] from the office of a hotel,[96] or from a part of a building occupied as a dwelling-house in another part, although the two parts have no internal communication.[97] But a taking from part of a building neither communicating with any part occupied as a dwelling nor occupied by the same person is not larceny from a dwelling-house.[98] The mere fact that a person habitually sleeps in a building does not make it a dwelling-house; so of a warehouse,[99] or a stable.[1] Taking clothes from a railing on the outer edge of an open piazza in the front of a dwelling-house does not constitute the statutory offense of "larceny in a dwelling-house."[2] In the Texas statute a theft by a domestic servant is excepted from the act, and is simple larceny only.[3] In Massachusetts stealing property of less than one hundred dollars value in a dwelling-house in the night was simple larceny, although in the daytime it is aggravated larceny by statute.[4] Entering a dwelling-house with intent to steal is sometimes made a statutory offense.[5]

b. "House" or "Outhouse." The statute sometimes creates the crime of larceny from a house. Under this form of statute the house need not be a dwelling, nor within the curtilage of a dwelling.[6] A chicken-coop is not a house,[7] nor is a tent.[8] But a railroad passenger station is a house.[9] An indictment for larceny from the house is sustained by proof that defendant took and carried away a watch from a post, on which it was hanging, covered by the roof of the building.[10] But an indictment for theft from a house cannot be sustained by proof that the stolen property was taken while hanging at and outside of the store door, on a piece of wood nailed to the door, facing and projecting toward the street.[11] A district school-house is not an outhouse.[12]

c. "Shop." A shop, properly so called, is a place where goods are sold by retail, and a store is a place of deposit; but in this country shops are frequently called stores, and a place called a millinery store may therefore be a shop.[13] A blacksmith shop is a shop.[14] So is a building where a workman pursues his business and keeps his tools, or the products of his labor, although no article is sold or offered for sale therein.[15]

d. "Warehouse," "Storehouse," or "Counting-House." To constitute the crime of larceny from a storehouse it is not sufficient that the building in which the crime was committed was built for a storehouse, but it must at the time of the offense have been used for that purpose.[16] A covered structure, used for storing cotton bales, one side and end of which are planked up, and the others left open so that wagons can drive under to load and unload, which, together with two acres of land connected with it, is inclosed by a plank fence nine feet high, the gates of which are kept locked, constitutes a "warehouse."[17] So does an opera house used for the storage of the stage properties between occasions when it is used for entertainments,[18] and a railroad station, part of which is used for storing freight,[19] and a meat house.[20] But a trunk near the door of a baggage-room on a platform, covered by the same roof, but not inclosed, which is used as a common passageway by all going about the depot, is not in a warehouse.[21] A building called a "machine house" on the premises of a person who had large chemical works, in which all goods sent out were weighed, and the men's time was taken and wages paid, although the books were kept in another building which was called the "office," might be found by the jury to be a "counting-house." [22]

e. "Building." A church is a building.[23] So is a corn-crib;[24] and a stationary structure, eight feet tall, covered with shingles and inclosed with wire, erected for the purpose of the safe-keeping of birds and fowls.[25] But a "refreshment saloon" is not necessarily a building.[26]

f. "Place." A warehouse occupied for business purposes only, and not within the curtilage of or connected with any dwelling-house, is a place.[27]

g. Protection or Control of Property. In order to constitute larceny in a dwelling-house or other dwelling the property stolen must indeed be under the protection of the house, and not under the eye or personal care of someone who happens to be in the house.[28] The personal effects of a sleeping man left beside the bed are under the protection of the dwelling;[29] but property immediately under the eye or upon the person of one who is awake is under his protection, and not under that of the house.[30] Property left by mistake is under the protection of the house,[31] but not property casually left.[32] The property need not belong to or be under the control of the owner of the house.[33]

h. Who May Commit Offense. A taking by the owner of the house is not larceny from the dwelling, since the object of the statute was not to protect against him;[34] nor is a taking by the owner's wife.[35] But a taking by a guest,[36] a boarder, or a lodger,[37] is larceny from the dwelling. A taking by a tenant who has hired a furnished house is not larceny from the dwelling.[38] One standing outside the house aiding and abetting is a principal in the offense.[39] But where witness stole a sack of money from a drawer, went outside the building, and handed it to defendant, who did not know what was in the sack, or that it was stolen, a conviction of larceny from the house was not sustained.[40]

i. Value of Property Stolen. When the punishment depends on the value of the property stolen, the value is found by adding the value of all the goods taken.[41] When the crime is made grand larceny by statute, the value of the property is immaterial.[42]

4. Larceny of Goods Affixed to a Building. To constitute the offense the goods must be taken directly from the building by defendant; the crime is not committed by taking the goods after they have been severed.[43]

5. Larceny From Vessel. The crime of larceny from a vessel is complete when a box of shoes has been broken open, and the shoes taken out of it and concealed in the vessel, although not carried out of the vessel.[44] Taking the luggage of a passenger going by a steamboat is larceny from a vessel.[45] In Massachusetts the offense is of a different kind according as the theft is committed at night or in the daytime.[46]

B. Statutory Crimes Similar to Larceny — 1. Larceny by Bailee — a. Nature of the Offense. The offense of larceny by bailee or agent has been frequently created by statute, being another method of dealing with the offense more commonly called embezzlement.[47] In some states it is held that where one intrusted with property by another fraudulently converts it to his own use, he is guilty of larceny after trust, although he may have fraudulently induced the delegation of the trust with intent to so convert the property, and therefore be guilty of larceny by trick.[48] In some states, although the statute makes the offense larceny, it is interpreted as creating a separate crime, namely, embezzlement;[49] this sometimes results in making an act embezzlement which would have been held larceny at common law.[50] In Massachusetts, on the other hand, such acts are now made simple acts of larceny, and punished on an ordinary indictment for larceny.[51] Under the ordinary form of statute the misuse of property, the legal title of which was in defendant, is not covered.[52] In some cases special statutes applying to particular classes of persons limit the general application of the law.[53]

b. The Bailment. The bailment required by the statute involves the element of trust in the bailee,[54] and therefore if there is no intentional trust extended to the bailee that he will return the thing in specie the offense is not committed.[55] But there need not be a technical contract of bailment.[56] The goods may have been delivered to defendant by a third person for the owner as well as by the owner himself.[57] Under the statute there is a bailment where one holds money given him to invest,[58] to buy goods,[59] to get changed,[60] or to pay for goods;[61] or money that he has collected for another,[62] or received for the sale of another's goods.[63] So there is a bailment where one holds the goods of another for sale,[64] or to deliver the same,[65] or on deposit;[66] or where goods are borrowed,[67] or bought for another.[68]

c. The Conversion. To sustain a charge of larceny by a bailee it is necessary to prove some act of conversion inconsistent with the purposes of the bailment.[69] If there is a conversion after bailment, the act forbidden by the statute is complete.[70] The conversion must be actual; a mere unexecuted contract by the bailee to sell the property is not necessarily a conversion,[71] nor is a mere offer to sell.[72] Although a repudiation of the owner's claim, and the assertion of title in the bailee, without other act, might constitute sufficient conversion.[73]

d. The Intent. The intent to steal must exist at the time of the conversion.[74]

2. Larceny by False Pretenses. Although the crime of obtaining property by false pretenses is an entirely distinct offense from larceny, statutes sometimes make the same act larceny.[75] The felonious intent must exist at the time of taking.[76]

3. Stealing Animals[77] — a. In General. There are special statutes relating to cattle stealing in many states.[78] The offense requires an intent to steal.[79] The statute is usually interpreted as not altering the common law; the stealing is larceny at common law and a distinct crime under the statute.[80] Therefore the degrees of larceny that exist at common law do not apply to cattle stealing, which is punishable under the statute whatever the value of the cattle.[81] A statute punishing stealing "an animal of the cow kind" includes stealing a steer.[82] The offense of stealing a horse does not include the offense of taking and using an estray,[83] nor of unlawfully or maliciously riding a horse, the property of another, without his consent.[84] The statute refers to live animals only.[85]

b. Larceny of Branded Cattle. Purchase in good faith is no defense to this crime in Texas.[86] In Arkansas and the Indian Territory unbranded cattle are by statute not subjects of common-law larceny.[87] Driving stock from its accustomed range is a statutory offense in Texas similar to larceny.[88]

4. Other Offenses Against Animals. Killing an animal with intent to steal the carcass is a statutory offense in England. It is committed when the intent is to steal part of the carcass,[89] and when the animal is wounded with the intent charged so that it dies later.[90] Other English statutes deal with unlawfully taking rabbits.[91] In Rhode Island wrongfully taking oysters from a private bed is a statutory offense distinct from larceny.[92] Stealing a slave was a special statutory offense.[93] "Stealing a free negro" was made an offense by statute.[94] Stealing poultry is made misdemeanor by statute.[95] The statute making the wilful killing of an animal larceny has no application where the killing follows asportation, as in that case the offense of larceny is complete.[96]

5. SEVERING FROM THE SOIL. Severing and carrying away timber is often a crime by statute.[97] This need not be done in public.[98] It does not apply to cord-wood already cut and piled on the land.[99] Larceny of an outstanding crop requires a felonious intent,[1] or at least an intent to take wrongfully.[2] Entering land and carrying off wood or other property means property growing on the land, and not money or other chattel on the land.[3] In Canada a special statute deals with offenses which consist in taking wood within the Indian country.[4]

6. HAVING IN POSSESSION IMPLEMENT COMMONLY USED FOR COMMISSION OF LARCENY. A shoplifter's bag is not an "implement, adapted, designed, or commonly used for the commission of" larceny within a statute making it an offense to have such implement in one's possession.[5]

7. MISCELLANEOUS OFFENSES. A number of statutes have been enacted creating special offenses of the taking of certain articles not the subject of larceny at common law, such as fixtures[6] or writings relating to real estate;[7] or punishing particularly the taking of certain articles which were subjects of larceny at common law, such as public records,[8] goods in process of manufacture,[9] or otherwise extending the common law.[10] Concealment of a will with fraudulent purpose is a statutory offense in England.[11] "Stealing rides" may be made criminal by statute, although a ride cannot be the subject of larceny.[12] A stream of water running by the side of a piece of ground, which is inclosed on every side except that on which it is bounded by the water, was not a stream in inclosed ground, within the English statute, so as to subject a person fishing therein to the penalty inflicted by that act.[13]

XIII. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION.[14]

A. General Principles — 1. CAPTION. A mistake in the caption as to the term of court does not vitiate an indictment.[15]

2. INDUCEMENT. An indictment alleging facts which constitute larceny need not in the inducement name the offense as larceny,[16] nor need it explicitly allege that the grade of the offense is grand or petit larceny;[17] nor is the indictment bad if it names the offense wrongly in the inducement, as by calling it embezzlement or burglary.[18]

3. METHOD OF ALLEGING — a. Positive Charges. The indictment must charge facts, not evidence by which the facts are to be proved,[19] and must allege the to angle in the park without leave. It was held that this was not a place where fish were to be considered as "bred, kept, or preserved" within the meaning of the act. Lisle v. Brown, 1 Marsh. 127, 5 Taunt. 440, 1 E. C. L. 229.

necessary facts affirmatively, not by mere implication,[20] or by way of suspicion.[21] It is not necessary, however, to use language with the utmost precision and nicety; a charge that is sufficiently clear according to the ordinary use of language is enough.[22]

b. Disjunctive or Conjunctive Allegations. An allegation in the disjunctive is good if the words connected mean the same thing,[23] or things so similar that there is no prejudice to defendant in charging them both; as for instance an allegation that defendant did lead or drive away an animal.[24] And by statute a disjunctive allegation, even though it leaves the charge somewhat indefinite, is allowed.[25]

4. Erroneous Use of Language — a. Mistakes in Spelling and Grammar. Mere errors in spelling which leave the sense clear and certain do not vitiate an indictment;[26] nor do mere errors of grammar which do not confuse the sense, such as wrong use of the singular or the plural number,[27] or under the same circumstances misuse of a word, as using "said" in a manner technically inaccurate,[28] or confusing a thing with the value of the thing.[29]

b. Omission of a Word. The omission of a word is not fatal to an indictment if the indictment contains a sufficient allegation of the offense without it. The omission of the word "away" from the technical allegation of asportation, "did steal, take and carry away," is not fatal, since the word "steal" of itself imports an asportation.[30] Therefore so long as the word "steal" is used the omission of the word "carry," so that the allegation was that defendant "feloniously did steal, take and away," is not fatal.[31] Where the word "steal" is also omitted so that the allegation reads merely "feloniously took and carried," the omission is fatal.[32] So the omission of a connecting word, if it does not confuse the meaning, will not vitiate the indictment.[33]

c. Repetition of a Word. The improper repetition of a word, so long as the sense is clear, will not vitiate the indictment.[34]

5. Unnecessary Averments — a. Duplicity. Where a statute or the common law provides several ways in which the offense may be committed, and the indictment charges the commission of a single offense, but in several ways, the indict-

Similarly in an indictment under a statute making it a misdemeanor to connect any pipe, tube, or other instrument with a water main for the purpose of fraudulently taking water therefrom, the complaint need not charge that the connection was made by means of a pipe, tube, or other instrument, since if made at all as alleged it must have been so made. Ex p. Helbing, 66 Cal. 215, 5 Pac. 103. ment is not bad for duplicity.[35] This, however, cannot be done where the offenses themselves are different.[36]

b. Surplusage. If the indictment contains a good charge of larceny, but contains additional useless allegations, these allegations will not harm the indictment if it is not thereby rendered so prolix as to prejudice defendant in making his defense.[37] Such needless allegations are rejected as surplusage.[38]

c. Repugnancy. Where, however, one allegation being enough, two contradictory allegations are inserted, neither can be rejected as surplusage, since it is uncertain which the grand jury accepted as the true one. The indictment is repugnant and void.[39]

B. Essential Parts of the Indictment — 1. The Taking. The indictment for larceny in its ordinary form charges that defendant "stole, took, and carried away" the goods.[40] An indictment is not bad which uses other terms, as "haul" for "carry,"[41] or omits steal,[42] or in the case of an animal charges that defendant did lead and drive away the animal.[43] Merely formal objections for immaterial errors are by statute not fatal to the indictment.[44] It is possible by statute to make an indictment which charges simply that defendant stole the property of a person named.[45]

2. Feloniously.[46] At common law, larceny being a felony, the indictment is bad if it does not allege that the act was felonious.[47] Under modern statutes other words may be used instead of the word of art "feloniously."[48] In the case of petit larceny, when not felonious, or sometimes of statutory larceny, it is not necessary to allege that the act was done feloniously.[49] But in such a case no harm is done by alleging that the act was feloniously done, the allegation being surplusage.[50] An

Applications of rule.—Thus where to a good and sufficient indictment for larceny are added allegations intended as charges of burglary or of larceny from a dwelling-house, but so imperfect that the indictment is insufficient for the greater offense, the imperfect allegations may be rejected as surplusage and the indictment will stand as a good indictment for larceny. allegation that the taking was against the law is not necessary,[51] nor that it was done without color of right.[52]

3. Fraudulently. In Texas and Virginia the statute recites the necessity of a fraudulent taking; and in those states, in addition to the allegation of intent to steal, the indictment must explicitly allege that the taking was fraudulent.[53]

4. Against the Will of the Owner.[54] The indictment must contain in some form the allegation that the taking was against the will of the owner. This was done at common law by an explicit statement that the taking was against the will or without the consent of the owner; and such an allegation was essential.[55] Where more than one owner is alleged, the consent of all the owners must be negatived.[56] Where goods are alleged to have been taken from a possessor, the ownership also being alleged, the consent of both the owner and the possessor must be negatived,[57] unless the possessor appears to have been a mere naked bailee without interest in the property.[58] In a few states, usually by statute, the consent of the owner need not be expressly alleged; the allegation that defendant feloniously stole, or some other allegation in the indictment, being regarded as sufficiently negativing the owner's consent.[59]

5. The Intent to Steal.[60] The intent to steal must be alleged in some form. This was explicitly done at common law, and the old form is, it seems, sufficient under the codes.[61] An immaterial variation of the form is not usually fatal to the indictment.[62] But in some form it is essential that the allegation should appear.[63] And in Texas the approved form is an allegation of the intent to deprive the owner of the value of the property taken.[64] It is usually held that the necessary intent is sufficiently implied by the allegation that defendant feloniously stole,[65] or even that he stole, this being sufficient to show the animus with which the act was done.[66]

C. Description of Goods[67] — 1. General Principles — a. Certainty of Description — (I) Introductory Statement. The description must be sufficiently certain to enable the jury to identify the property described in the indictment with that referred to by the evidence, and to show the court that the property is a subject of larceny.[68]

(II) Definiteness. The description may be too general and indefinite to support a conviction.[69] An alternative description is bad, if it is impossible, as "one certain trunk or chest,"[70] or if it is uncertain, as "three head of neat stock or beeves," all neat stock not being beeves.[71] Even if the description is conceivably ambiguous, it is usually held sufficient if it is reasonably certain.[72]

(III) Subject of Larceny. The allegations must be sufficient to show that the property is subject of larceny. Where certain varieties of a general class of things are subject of larceny, while others are not, it is necessary to specify the facts which make the things described subjects of larceny.[73] But in the case of an animal habitually domesticated or confined and used for food, it is enough to give the name of the animal.[74] Otherwise, however, when the crime is different according as the animal is alive or dead, it should be alleged to be dead, if that is the fact.[75] Where the description shows the property to be personal there need be no allegation that it is personal, or that it is the subject of larceny.[76] In the case of goods, the larceny of which is made criminal by statute, it is generally

73. See cases cited infra, this note.

Applications of rule.— Thus it is not sufficient to say that defendant stole "five fish" without stating the conditions which render them the subject of larceny (State v. Krider, 78 N. enough to use the statutory description.[77] Where a statute excepts from among the subjects of larceny a hog over a year old running at large unmarked, it is not necessary in an indictment for larceny of a hog to negative the exception.[78] In some states the stealing of vegetable products cultivated for food or the market is made larceny by statute. In framing an indictment under such a statute it is necessary to allege that the fruit or product taken was cultivated for food or market.[79] It is not necessary to make the allegation where the product stolen is specifically named in the statute.[80] And where a statute punishes the stealing of an outstanding crop, it is necessary to show that the thief severed it from the soil.[81]

b. Name of Article[82] — (i) Class Name. It is sufficient description of chattels to enumerate giving the class name.[83]

(ii) Raw Material or Product.[84] When raw material has been changed to some extent by labor, it may nevertheless still be called by the name of the material provided it has not been wrought into a new substance with a specific name to designate it.[85] When, however, the product has a specific distinguishing name, that name must be used to describe it.[86] Substances mechanically mixed should not be described "as a certain mixture consisting of, etc.," but by the names applicable to them before such mixture; otherwise with regard to substances chemically mixed, since there is a change of nature.[87]

c. Number or Quantity. A statement of the number or quantity of the articles

84. Variance see infra, XIII, F.

85. See cases cited infra, this note.

Illustrations.— Thus a bale of cotton may be described as cotton (Peters v. State, 100 Ala. 10, 14 So. 896), a cord of wood as wood (State v. Labauve, 46 La. Ann. 548, 15 So. 172), or lumps of tin or ingots as twenty-five pounds weight of tin (Reg. v. Mansfield, C. & M. 140, 5 Jur. 661, 41 E. C. L. 81); so "corn in the ear" may be described as three bushels of corn (State v. Nipper, 95 N. C. 653), or as Indian corn or maize (Com. v. Pine, 2 Pa. L. J. Rep. 154, 3 Pa. L. J. 411).

86. See cases cited infra, this note.

Illustrations.— Thus books of printed sheets after they are bound cannot be described as printed sheets (Com. v. Merrifield, 4 Mete. (Mass.) 468), or a coat as cloth (Com. v. Clair, 7 Allen (Mass.) 525), or a piece of cloth as so many pounds of wool (Reg. v. Mansfield, C. & M. 140, 5 Jur. 661, 41 E. C. L. 81). A set of handkerchiefs not yet separated may, however, be described as so many handkerchiefs. Rex v. Nibbs, 1 Moody C. C. 25.

taken is usually a necessary part of the description. Thus "a lot of cord wood" is not sufficiently definite.[88] Nor is "some bottled beer."[89] It is insufficient to allege that defendant stole "cattle."[90] But a "parcel of oats" was held good.[91]

d. Description Unknown. Where an offense is substantially set out in the indictment a matter of description may be omitted where a good excuse for such omission is given, as that a fuller description is unknown.[92] But if the description was not unknown as alleged it is a fatal variance.[93]

2. Particular Kinds of Goods — a. Written Instruments — (i) General Principles. A written instrument must be sufficiently described to enable the jury to identify the instrument, and the accused to understand the accusation; no greater particularity is required.[94] A description by the ordinary name by which it is designated, the amount secured by it, and the ownership is enough, as in case of a bank-check,[95] a pay-check,[96] a pension check,[97] or a county warrant.[98] A certain instrument in writing containing evidence of an existing contract for the conveyance of real estate, to wit, a lot in A, of the value, etc., was held sufficient on motion to arrest.[99] A post-office order may be described as a warrant or order for the payment of money.[1] And coupons of state bonds may be described without describing the bonds from which they were cut.[2] The description must be positive, not inferential; a description of "four pieces of paper commonly called 'United States five-twenty bonds'" does not sufficiently allege the crime of stealing government bonds.[3] Immaterial errors in the description are not fatal.[4] An indictment for stealing valuable security must particularize the kind of security stolen,[5] and if a check it need not state the drawees to be bankers.[6] But the charge must be laid within the words of the statute, as a "check of or on any bank."[7] It is not ordinarily necessary to include any averment as to the validity of the instrument, as that there is money due upon it,[8] or that it is valid and binding,[9] or that the maker is bound to pay it,[10] or in the case of bank-notes that the bank was legally incorporated[11] or was solvent,[12] nor in the case of a deed need it be alleged to be of value.[13] But if the instrument is so described as to be obviously invalid, the indictment is bad; as an indictment describing bills of credit of a denomination which could not be legally issued.[14] And it has been held that an indictment for stealing railroad tickets should allege that they had been stamped, dated, and signed, as otherwise they would not be in force.[15]

(II) Promissory Notes. It is sufficient to describe a promissory note as one promissory note for the payment of money,[16] or simply as a promissory note,[17] or even as a note.[18] Where the article stolen was described as a bank post bill the court could not take notice that it was a promissory note unless the bill were set out in the indictment.[19] Promissory notes being the subject of larceny only by statute, an indictment for stealing them must conclude contra formam statuti.[20]

b. Money — (I) In General. Money, whether in the form of coin, national paper currency, or bank-notes, need be described no more exactly than any other kind of chattel; that is, the description must be sufficiently definite reasonably to identify the subject of the larceny charged, and to inform defendant of the charge against him.[21] And where the jury does not know the specific description of money it may so aver.[22] Money is improperly described as goods and chattels, or as so many dollars, the goods and chattels of a person named.[23] But if the money is otherwise sufficiently described, an allegation that it is of the goods and chattels of the owner may be rejected as surplusage.[24] Since paper money is not subject of larceny at common law, but is universally made so by statutes, the statutes have also commonly provided for the description of money in indictments. In many jurisdictions it is made sufficient by statute to describe money as so much money, without specifying more particularly the kind of money.[25] A description of money as so many dollars, without adding that it is money, is sufficient.[26] Bank-notes are properly described in an indictment for larceny as money, although at the time they were stolen they were not in circulation, but were in the hands of the bankers themselves.[27] In some jurisdictions it has been held necessary to describe money by the denomination of the separate pieces,[28] and where the denomination is unknown an allegation to that effect is necessary to make the description sufficient.[29] And in some jurisdictions the courts go so far as to require an allegation of inability to obtain knowledge.[30] In other jurisdictions it is held that it is not necessary to state the kinds and denominations of the separate pieces of money.[31]

larceny of "money," however, the stealing of a check or draft for the payment of money may be proved.[37]

(III) Coin. Coin is properly described as copper or silver coin of the United States of a certain value.[38] A charge of the theft of seven dollars in silver is supported by evidence of a theft of five silver dollars and two dollars in minor coin.[39] In Texas an indictment for stealing coin was held insufficient for not naming the government which issued the coin.[40] The coin need not be alleged to be current.[41] A coin may be described simply as money, under common statutes.[42]

(IV) United States Paper Currency. The allegation that the thing taken was lawful money has been held sufficient.[43] And so of the allegation that it was lawful money of the United States.[44] "Gold and silver coin and paper currency" is a good statutory description.[45] Even if the money is not required to be described as lawful money of the United States, such an allegation if made is descriptive, and must be proved; and it is a variance to prove the taking of Canadian money.[46] Some statutes permit promissory notes to be described simply as money. The constitutionality of such a provision has been doubted.[47] Current paper money of the United States is enough.[48] And so of "greenback currency of the United States,"[49] national bank currency and treasury notes;[50] current money of the United States,[51] national currency,[52] national bank currency,[53] lawful currency of the United States,[54] or United States currency.[55] But "one hundred and fifty dollars in United States currency" has been held defective.[56] "United States treasury note" is sufficient, without stating the kind.[57] Greenbacks are included as treasury notes,[58] but "greenbacks" has been held a sufficient description of itself.[59] "Gold certificate" is good,[60] and "promissory notes of the United States" has been held sufficient.[61] On the other hand it has been held insufficient to describe money as "paper money of the United States,"[62] or as so many "bills."[63] But "bills" is a good description in the indictment and a new trial should be granted where the charge was for stealing bills and there was no proof that they were bank-bills.[64] Larceny of bills will not sustain indictment for the larceny of lawful money of the United States.[65] Where the indictment charges the theft of treasury notes, proof must be made that they were issued by the authority of the United States.[66] The decisions in Texas have not been uniform. The description "one ten-dollar bill of lawful currency of the United States" is good.[67] So is the description, "one five-dollar bill in money,"[68] "in United States currency,"[69] "in greenback currency of the United States,"[70] or "in United States paper currency";[71] but "twenty ten (10) dollar paper currency money of the United States of America of the denomination and value of twenty dollars each" was held unintelligible.[72] Under such a description, however, the courts have not always permitted proof of stealing certain kinds of paper currency. Thus it has been held that "lawful currency" or "current money" includes treasury notes, but not national bank-notes or coin certificates.[73] United States paper currency, however, was held to include national bank-notes and coin certificates.[74]

(v) Bank-Notes. The description of bank-notes in an indictment need be no more exact than that of other chattels or written instruments; a reasonable identification is all that is necessary.[75] A bank-bill may be described as a promissory note.[76] But a silver certificate cannot be so described.[77] It is enough to describe notes issued by banks and circulating as money as bank-bills,[78] or bank-notes,[79] which are equivalent terms.[80] It is not necessary to show that they were the notes of any particular bank,[81] although it was formerly customary to give the name of the bank or allege that it was unknown.[82] And it has sometimes been held necessary to state the name of the bank,[83] and the state of charter.[84] And the indictment should allege by what authority the note was issued.[85] The date of the note need not be set out.[86] Nor need the indictment state the tenor of the note.[87] It has been held, however, that "Kentucky bank note" was too indefinite.[88]

c. Animals[89]— (1) In General. An animal is usually sufficiently described by giving its ordinary name, without further particulars. The color of an animal need not be given,[90] but doing so does not vitiate the indictment.[91] The description of an animal by its common appellation usually means the live and not the dead animal,[92] even where the animal is of a kind ordinarily used for food,[93] unless the animal is equally well known by the name used, whether dead or alive.[94] The description of animals has in several states been simplified by statutes which make it sufficient to describe an animal by its generic name.[95]

(II) Description of Particular Animals. The generic word "horse" is sufficient to describe any animal of the species,[96] or a specific name may be given, as mare.[97] So horse includes gelding,[98] and mare includes filly.[99] Under special statutes concerning the stealing of horses, where certain species were separately enumerated by the names denoting age and sex, it is held in some cases that the specific name as given in the statute must be used.[1] This has been changed in Texas.[2] The generic name is a sufficient designation, as cattle,[3] beef cattle,[4] or neat cattle;[5] or a specific name may be given, as cow,[6] ox,[7] bull,[8] steer or beef steer,[9] heifer,[10] calf,[11] bull yearling,[12] or "two beeves, the same being cattle."[13] If a specific name is given, but one that in ordinary speech stands for several species, it will include such species. Thus cow includes heifer.[14] But a specific name will not cover any animal not included in the species. Thus steer does not include cow[15] or bull.[16] Other animals are also usually described sufficiently by the generic name. Thus "sheep" includes "rig" and "wether,"[17] or "lamb."[18] In England at one time it was held that in an indictment upon a statute which punished the larceny of several species of sheep, naming them, the specific name must be correctly given in the indictment.[19] But these English cases were finally overruled and the generic name "sheep" was held sufficient under the statute to include a lamb.[20] "Hog" or "head of hogs" is enough to cover any variety of swine.[21] "Pig" is good without alleging the sex.[22] But "female hog" will not cover a boar.[23] It was held in an early case, under a statute punishing hog stealing, that the statutory word "hog" must be used, and an indictment for stealing a pig would not be good.[24] Hens may be described as chickens.[25]

D. Special Allegations — 1. Time.[26] The time of the offense must be stated in the indictment.[27] This must be done in such a way as to show that the offense was committed after the act was made criminal,[28] and that the statute of limitations has not run against the act alleged.[29] And the date alleged must not be impossible, as for instance after the finding of the indictment.[30] The time alleged in the indictment need not be proved, however; it is enough to prove the commission of the offense at any time before the finding of the indictment.[31] By statute the necessity for alleging a definite time is often dispensed with. Under such a statute it has been held that an indictment is good which leaves a blank for the time,[32] or alleges that the act "has been committed,"[33] or that the act was committed "on or about" a certain day,[34] or even alleges a future day.[35] When time is of the essence of an offense, as in the case of larceny from a dwelling in the night-time, it is essential to allege and prove the time.[36] The time of each part of the offense need not be separately averred.[37]

2. Place.[38] The place of every offense must be alleged in the indictment, in order to establish the venue; and the allegation must merely be sufficiently precise to make the venue of the act certain.[39] As is true of time, the exact place stated need not be proved; it is enough to prove any place within the jurisdiction of the court.[40] But if the place of the commission of an offense enters into and is material for the description of the offense, it must be exactly alleged and proved.[41] This is always true in the case of so-called "local" crimes. 40. People v. Honeyman, 3 Den. (N. Y.) 121.

41. Thus to give the United States courts jurisdiction of an offense on the ground that it was committed in a place under the sole an indictment for larceny from a building or for burglary the place of the building must be alleged and proved with exactness, as a necessary part of the description of the offense.[42] Where goods are stolen in one county or state and brought by the thief into a second county or state, an indictment for theft in the latter county may simply allege a theft in that county, without mentioning the original taking;[43] or it may allege the original taking and the bringing into the county where the indictment is found;[44] but it is of course defective if it neither alleges that the larceny was committed in the latter county or that the property was brought there.[45]

3. Value[46] — a. In General. The old distinction between grand and petit larceny depends upon the value of the goods taken; and an indictment for grand larceny must therefore state the value of the goods in order to show that the crime was of the higher degree.[47] And where on conviction damages are allowed to the owner, based upon the value of the goods stolen, the value must be alleged in order to justify granting such damages.[48] If no value is stated, the indictment might be sufficient as an indictment for petit larceny,[49] but there is authority to the contrary.[50] Where by statute an aggravated form of larceny is punished without reference to the value of the goods stolen, the value need not be stated in the indictment. It is so held in respect of larceny from the person,[51] larceny from a building,[52] or larceny of an animal.[53] The value alleged is the market and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, the fact that the crime was committed in such a place must be averred. U. S. v. Davis, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 14,930, 5 Mason 356.

value.[54] And the allegation must be sufficiently certain.[55] The value of current money need not be stated, since it is obviously the face value as alleged in the description.[56] A common statutory provision is that the money due on a promissory note, check, etc., shall be deemed the value of the instrument. Under this statute in an indictment for larceny of a bank-note, when the description of the note states its denomination, no other allegation of value need be made.[57] And in an indictment for larceny of a check, draft, or promissory note, the description of the instrument contains a sufficient allegation that the amount named is due and is therefore its value.[58]

b. Collective Value. Where in a single count several things are alleged to have been taken the value of each article should properly be stated separately. If a single value has been stated for all the goods a conviction is possible only if the taking of all the goods is proved, since if the jury finds a part only of the goods taken there is no value of such goods alleged. The indictment is, however, not invalid, and if the jury finds that all the goods named were stolen a conviction will be sustained.[59] If the better practice is followed, and the separate values are stated, it is not necessary to allege the aggregate value.[60]

4. NAME.[61] A person's name is that by which he is commonly known; and if a person is commonly and habitually known by a certain name he may be called by that name in an indictment, even though his right name is different.[62] Where defendant is a woman who at the time of the larceny was unmarried, her name at that time should be stated, although she has since been married.[63] The name includes both the christian name and the surname; and, unless one or the other is unknown, both must be given.[64] But where a christian name and surname are given, an alias surname may be given without repeating the christian name.[65] And where that is the case the surname may be stated as unknown and the christian name stated.[66] Both christian and surname must be exactly stated; and any error in the names or in the order of the names is fatal.[67] By statute in many states an immaterial variance is not fatal.[68] And sometimes without the aid of a statute, where a name repeated in an indictment is wrongly given by an obvious slip of the pen, the error is not fatal.[69] Where there are father and son of the same name, the latter commonly distinguished by the addition "junior," this is not part of the name, and its omission is not error.[70] An addition of "esquire" is immaterial, and need not be proved.[71] In most states it is sufficient to designate the christian name or names by initials.[72] An error in spelling a name which nevertheless leaves the sound correct is not fatal; a form of a name which is idem sonans with the correct form is sufficient.[73] It is sufficient in naming a corporation against which a larceny is alleged to have been committed to give a form by which it is generally known,[74] and especially a form by which defendant knows and will recognize it.[75] The rule as to idem sonans applies to corporate names; "Chatam Bank" is not fatal where the true name is "Chatham Bank."[76] It is not enough, however, to give a common abbreviation for the name; "Mo. P. Ry. Company" is not a sufficient averment of the name "Missouri Pacific Railway Company."[77]

5. Ownership — a. In General. In an indictment for larceny the ownership of the property must be alleged.[78] It is not sufficient to allege that the goods were taken from the person of another.[79] And obviously an allegation that the goods were taken from the premises of a certain person is not a sufficient allegation of possession.[80] No special form of allegation is necessary. Thus it may be alleged that the goods were "the property of" the person named,[81] his "goods and chattels,"[82] his "personal goods and chattels,"[83] that they belonged to the person named,[84] or that the person named was the owner.[85] It is not necessary, in addition to alleging ownership, to state the person from whose possession the goods were taken.[86] The allegation that the goods were the property of the person named is a sufficient allegation that they were his goods at the time of the theft, without further identification of the time.[87] Ownership in a particular person is not an essential element in the crime; the allegation is merely part of the description and identification of the goods.[88] It is sufficient, it has been held, to charge the ownership in A or B, and to prove it in either;[89] but to charge that the accused fraudulently drove away cattle without the authority of the owner is not tantamount to an allegation that the cattle were not the property of the accused.[90] The allegation of ownership is material, and must be proved as alleged in order to secure conviction.[91] By statute the allegation of ownership may be made unnecessary or a variance immaterial.[92]

b. Who Should Be Laid as Owner[93] — (i) Ownership in Possessor. The actual condition of the legal title is immaterial to the thief; so far as he is concerned, one may be taken as the owner who was in peaceable possession of it, and whose possession was unlawfully disturbed by the taking. The possessor of the goods from whom the thief took them may therefore properly be described as owner in the indictment.[94] The possession must be actual; right of possession alone will not suffice.[95] Nor a general direction and control, not amounting to a legal possession.[96] The goods need not be in the actual manual possession of the person described as owner at the moment of taking; it is enough that he was legally the possessor.[97] Upon this principle the property of goods stolen may be laid in a bailee from whom they were taken,[98] as for instance in a common

(II) Ownership in Legal Owner. Instead of naming the person from whose possession the goods were taken as owner, it is optional with the pleader to name the true owner as such, although the property was in the possession of another.[23] When the owner of property is indicted for larceny of it by taking it from a bailee, the property cannot be laid in defendant; it must be laid in the bailee alone.[24] Any legal interest in the goods, although less than the absolute title, will support an allegation of ownership.[25] But there must be an actual legal interest, not a mere claim or expectation of interest. Thus a seller who has delivered the goods cannot be described as owner merely because negotiations are pending between him and the buyer for canceling the sale.[26] So claiming ownership and attempting without success to do acts of ownership is not enough to justify a description as owner.[27] The ostensible ownership is, however, enough to justify the description. So far as the thief is concerned, he cannot question the title of the apparent owner.[28]

(III) The Texas Doctrine. In Texas both the ownership and the possession of the goods at the time of taking must be alleged.[29] And an allegation of possession is not an allegation of ownership.[30] The person must be named as possessor who actually had the legal possession of the goods.[31] And generally speaking

C. 1112, 36 S. E. 113); so the title of goods taken from a carrier may be laid in the consignee (Com. v. Sullivan, 104 Mass. 552; Walker v. State, 9 Tex. possession must be proved as laid.[32] Possession may be established by showing that the person named had the management and control of the goods.[33] A guardian in control of his ward's property may be named as possessor.[34] But one who is not actually in physical control may be the possessor.[35] The absolute legal owner may be named as such; or any person may be named as owner who may be taken as an owner so far as the thief is concerned; which ordinarily includes any possessor who has an interest in the property or exercises any control or management.[36]

(IV) JOINT OWNERSHIP. Where goods are owned by several persons, allegation of ownership in one of them only is erroneous.[37] Every one of the joint owners must be named.[38] If, however, one of the joint owners is in possession and control of the goods, he may be named alone as the owner.[39] But temporary absence of one joint owner is not enough to give a separate possession to the other, so as to justify an allegation that he is owner.[40] Conversely an indictment is erroneous which alleges joint ownership when the property really belongs to one of the parties named individually.[41] It is provided by statute in several states that if property is owned by several it shall be sufficient to allege the ownership in one of the owners.[42] The statute will not, however, cure the error

(v) Unknown Owner. But ownership may, if such is the case, be laid in a person unknown.[44] Where ownership was averred as unknown but possession was in A the indictment was held sufficient.[45] The indictment fails, however, if it is proved that the owner was in fact known, since there is a variance;[46] and this is true, even though the grand jury was in fact ignorant of the ownership, if by reasonable diligence they might have discovered the owner;[47] therefore evidence of the taking of goods belonging to a known person is inadmissible.[48] It is not necessary to aver that the unknown person is not defendant.[49]

App. 307, 70 S. W. 964. The keeper of the poor-farm is servant of the superintendent, and the title of chattels taken from the keeper should be laid in the superintendent. People v. Bennett, 37 N. Y.

(II) Married Woman. Since by the common law all a woman's choses in possession pass to her husband directly upon marriage, or upon their acquisition after marriage, and her possession is his, she has neither title to chattels nor possession of them; and the ownership of all chattels stolen from her must therefore be laid in the husband.[51] This is true not only of the property used in common,[52] but also of the money furnished to the wife by her husband for her own purposes,[53] and her clothes and paraphernalia,[54] and stock in trade in a shop conducted by her.[55] Even if the goods have just been acquired by the wife, and have never been in the husband's hands, they should be described as his.[56] Where goods are taken from the woman before her marriage, ownership should be laid in her in her maiden name.[57] Under modern statutes women are given title to their separate personal property, and may have separate possession of it. When a wife owns and possesses chattels and they are stolen from her, ownership may be laid in her.[58] When, however, the possession of the wife's separate property is actually in the husband he may be described as owner.[59] So where her chattel is used for household purposes with her assent the property may be laid either in her or in her husband.[60] Conversely, when the property of the husband is in the wife's possession she may be described as owner on account of her possession.[61] When under the statute a wife cannot acquire property from her husband, a chattel given her by her husband must be described as his, as at common law.[62] When a wife is separated from her husband, whether rightly or wrongly, the property in goods stolen from her possession may be laid in her.[63]

(III) Parent and Child. When a minor child living with his father is in possession of wearing apparel or other property which is stolen, it may be described in the indictment as the property of the child.[64] But it is not error, although not the better course, to lay the property in the father.[65] But if the goods were taken from the possession of the father he should be named as owner.[66]

(IV) Property of a Deceased Person. Since a dead man cannot own property, an indictment which describes stolen goods as the goods of A deceased is bad.[67] Nor at common law could the property be laid in an estate, since an estate is not a person in the law.[68] Where the owner dies intestate, the property taken before the appointment of the administrator should be laid in the ordinary.[69] Where the owner dies testate and the executor accepts, the ownership of goods stolen at any time after death should be laid in him, and the ownership of goods taken after the appointment of an administrator should be laid in him. In this country the appointment of administrator would probably be held to relate back to the death, and the ownership of goods taken at any time after the death might be laid in him.[70] Although doubtless an indictment laying the ownership of goods taken between death and the appointment of the administrator in the probate judge would be supported. An indictment laying the property in the administrator and the heirs is erroneous.[71] When, however, the heir is in actual possession and control of the goods, the property may be laid in him and not in the administrator,[72] as for instance in the widow and children in actual possession, no administrator having been appointed;[73] and so where one partner dies, and his widow or child continues the business on his behalf, the property may be laid in the widow or child and the surviving partner jointly.[74] It is sometimes provided by statute that the ownership of goods belonging to a deceased person may be laid in the estate.[75]

(V) Corporation.[76] When the ownership of goods is laid in a corporation, the corporate name must be given, but the fact of incorporation need not be alleged, at least if the name imports incorporation.[77] If the name does not of itself import incorporation, the association named must be alleged to be a corporation or else the names of the members must be given.[78] If the fact of incorporation is alleged, it is unnecessary to aver incorporation under the general laws or under a private statute.[79] The incorporation is sufficiently proved by establishing its existence de facto.[80] A copy of the general incorporation law and of the articles of association is competent evidence.[81]

(VI) UNINCORPORATED ASSOCIATION.[82] In the case of a partnership or other unincorporated association the names of all the individuals composing the association must be given.[83] In the case of certain English societies the property may be laid in one or more of the trustees or other officers.[84] And under the statute as to alleging joint ownership, it is enough to lay the property in one member of the association.[85]

(VII) MISCELLANEOUS SPECIAL CASES. In other special cases special forms of allegation must be used. Thus a bible, the property of an unincorporated religious society, is rightly alleged to be the property of A, one of the trustees, and others,[86] or of the trustees of the church.[87] Property of an established church in England, where the benefice is a vicarage, may be laid as the property of the vicar,[88] or of the vicar and churchwardens,[89] or of the churchwardens.[90] The property cannot be laid in "the parishioners;" some individual must be named.[91] Property purchased for the use of the poor and stolen may in England be described as goods of the overseers of the poor.[92] In this country they should not be so described,[93] but should be alleged to be the goods of the county.[94] Property owned for ordinary county purposes, or held by it in its corporate capacity, should be described as goods of the county.[95] When the property of the goods of one sentenced for felony vests in the queen, it is not error to describe as the property of the queen goods of an adjudged felon stolen from the possession of his wife.[96] Property belonging to the state in the hands of the treasurer may be described as the property of the state.[97]

E. Indictments For Allied Offenses — 1. Accessary.[98] In indicting an accessary before the fact, who had procured the principal to commit the offense for him, it is enough to allege the facts of the crime, and then allege that the principal acted for defendant, even though by statute defendant might have been charged directly with committing the crime.[99] And where defendant became an accessary by procuring or by giving aid to the principal, either before or after the fact, it is enough to allege generally that he procured or aided the principal, without alleging the circumstances of the procurement or aid.[1]

2. Attempt.[2] An indictment for attempt to commit larceny must at common law set out the acts which constituted the attempt.[3] By statute, however, an indictment which simply alleges in general terms that defendant attempted to steal may be good.[4] An indictment for an attempt to commit larceny from the person must allege an assault.[5] It is not necessary, in an indictment for attempt to steal, to specify or describe the goods intended to be stolen.[6] So of burglary with intent to commit larceny.[7]

3. Second Offense.[8] Where a second offense is punished more severely than a first offense, an indictment for a second offense should contain an exact description of the first conviction.[9] Where the increased punishment is provided for one who is convicted of three or more larcenies at the same term of court, it is obvious that the prior convictions cannot be stated in either indictment, and the punishment may be inflicted on an ordinary indictment for larceny.[10] Where an indictment charges in different counts the larceny of goods of different persons on the same day, and the record recites that he was convicted of three distinct larcenies as a basis for sentencing him as a common thief, it will not be presumed that the several larcenies charged were really one offense committed by stealing the property of several persons at one time, since, if such were the fact, one count would have been sufficient.[11]

4. Statutory Extensions of Larceny[12] — a. General Principles. When statutory offenses, such as embezzlement or obtaining by false pretenses, are made larceny by statute, and it is regarded as an actual extension of the offense, the statute may provide that the crime may be proved under an indictment for larceny,[13] or the facts may be stated in full.[14] And if there is no statutory permission for charging

it as larceny, the facts which constitute the offense charged must be set out in full.[15]

b. Larceny by Bailee.[16] The indictment for this offense must be so framed as to cover the acts forbidden by the statute, and is sufficient if it does so.[17] All the statutory elements must be alleged; thus, it must be alleged whose bailee defendant was,[18] and that he was a bailee for hire, if that is required by the statute,[19] and the facts showing the bailment must be alleged,[20] although not the details of the agreement which resulted in the bailment.[21] On the other hand, facts not material under the statute need not be alleged, such as the particulars of the conversion;[22] the consideration for the bailment, where none is required by the statute;[23] or an intent to appropriate.[24]

c. Larceny From the Person.[25] An indictment for larceny from the person is sufficient if it states all the elements of the offense, although it does not use the exact language of the statute.[26] All the statutory elements must be alleged,[27] including of course the fact that the taking was from the person.[28] The common-law elements of larceny must also be alleged.[29] If, however, the statute does not use the word it is not necessary to charge that the stealing was felonious.[30] An indictment for grand larceny in stealing money from the person need not aver that it was stolen in the night-time; and a conviction may be sustained, if property of any value is taken, the statute making any taking from the person grand larceny.[31]

d. Larceny From a Dwelling-House, or Other Building.[32] Only the actual requirements for the crime, as laid down in the statute, need be stated. It is not necessary to allege facts not essential for the offense.[33] On the other hand any fact made essential by the statute must be alleged.[34] A description which is clear according to the ordinary meaning of words is sufficient. may be described as a residence[35] or as a dwelling,[36] and a shop may be called such, although it is spoken of in the evidence as a store;[37] although where a difference between shop and store is made in the statute the right word must be used in the indictment.[38] A warehouse may be described as a storehouse.[39] The ownership must be stated correctly,[40] although it has been held that where the building is otherwise sufficiently described, as by stating a specific name by which it is known, the owner's name need not be given.[41] A person who hires a room in a house may be described as owner of the house when goods were taken from the room.[42] But the owner of the building who has leased it to another, in whose exclusive possession it is, cannot be described as owner.[43] An allegation of stealing from a house sufficiently charges larceny in a house and vice versa.[44] It has been held unnecessary to state all the facts necessary to a common-law indictment for larceny.[45]

e. Miscellaneous Offenses Kindred to Larceny. The same principle covers all statutory offenses akin to larceny; the indictment must charge all the essential statutory elements. An indictment for cutting timber covering all the language of the statute is sufficient,[46] but an indictment failing to allege the intent is defective.[47] An indictment for stealing a portion of an outstanding crop is good, under a statute punishing stealing part of such crop.[48] "Fraudulently took," being equivalent to "steal" in the statute, is sufficient without adding "stole."[49] Under a statute punishing one who severs and steals corn, fruit, etc., or other annual product, it is enough to allege a taking of one of the enumerated products without averring it to be an annual product, but if the product is not among those specified, such an averment is necessary.[50] It must be alleged that defendant had no right in the thing taken.[51] It is not sufficient to allege a taking in the field; the taking must be alleged to have been from the field.[52] Indictments upon certain English statutes by which it is made a crime to take deer from parks or fish preserved in a stream or pond have been considered in many decisions.[53] An indictment for larceny from the mail need not allege that the letter was intended to be delivered.[54] The indictment may allege both that defendant stole and that he embezzled the letter, where the statute makes the two acts identical.[55] In an indictment for the taking temporary use of an animal, the consent of the person having control must be negatived.[56] The statutory word

"wilfully" need not be used in an indictment for killing cattle with intent to steal, since the other allegations necessarily import that the act was wilful.[57] In an indictment for defacing ear-marks on cattle with intent to steal, the ear-marks need not be described, nor the method of defacing alleged.[58] An indictment for taking ore from a mine must show that the ore was in the mine when taken.[59] In an indictment for buying cotton in the seed, the name of the owner of the cotton and the person from whom it was bought must be alleged.[60] For the offense of "stealing bank-bills knowing them to be such" the indictment must aver the knowledge.[61]

F. Variance[62] — 1. General Principles. Where the evidence does not support the indictment, in that while it shows a larceny it indicates also that the larceny has been misdescribed in some material particular, there is a variance, and defendant must be acquitted.[63] If, however, the description is sufficiently full and definite to identify the transaction and to inform defendant of the charge, a mere technical inaccuracy of description will not make the indictment erroneous.[64]

An indictment for stealing three one-gallon crocks of preserved pears will not support a conviction for stealing one three-gallon crock. People v. Kehoe, 19 N. Y. Suppl. 763. If an animal is described as dead, proof that it was taken alive is a variance. Reg. v. Roe, 11 Cox C. C. 554, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 414. And conversely if it is described as alive proof that it was dead when taken will not support the indictment. Rex v. Halloway, 1 C. & P. 128, 12 E. C. L. 84; Rex v. Edwards, R. & R. 370. An indictment for stealing a writ issued from the office of the court is not sustained by evidence of taking such a writ not yet issued. State v. McLeod, 5 Jones (N. C.) 318. An indictment for stealing bank-notes, properly described, can be supported only by evidence of taking bank-notes exactly answering to the description. Pomeroy v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 342. Thus on an indictment for stealing "a person's garment commonly called a waterproof coat" proof of stealing a gum coat is sufficient. State v. Heck, 1 Marv. (Del.) 524, 41 Atl. 142. So an indictment for stealing one double-case silver watch is supported by evidence of taking from a jeweler's bench the works and the case of the watch, which had been separated for purposes of repair. Patterson v. State, 122 Ga. 587, 50 S. E. 489. And an allegation of "notes of a bank" covers bank-notes. State v. Vanderlip, 4 La. Ann. 444. So an indictment charging theft of national bank-bills was supported by evidence that state bank-bills were taken, where it appeared that the witnesses did not know a national bank-bill, and evidently meant bills issued by the national banks located in different states. Keating v. People, 160 Ill. 480, 43 N. E. 724. An indictment charging theft of treasury notes was supported by evidence that a gold certificate and several silver certificates were among the bills taken, and evidence that they were genuine. By statute it is often provided that an immaterial variance shall not prevent a conviction.[65]

2. UNNECESSARY DESCRIPTIVE ALLEGATIONS. When an allegation necessary for the description of the property is made unnecessarily precise, the description given, although unnecessary, must be exactly proved.[66] If, however, the entire allegation is an unnecessary one, so that it may be rejected as surplusage, variance in a part of the description is not material.[67] So when the unnecessary minute description is in the alternative, since the indictment is good without it and defendant is not misled, it is enough to prove either branch of the description.[68] It is usually unnecessary to describe the color of an animal, but if described it must be proved as stated.[69] It is unnecessary to describe the brand on an animal, but if the brand or its position on the animal is described the proof must correspond.[70]

wheel." The evidence was that the wheel had been broken up and converted into "old iron" by defendants to facilitate removal. This was no variance, since they really took the whole wheel. Gettinger v. State, 13 Nebr. 308, 14 N. W. 403. So a shoulder wrap may be described as a cape. Waller v. People, 175 Ill. 221, 51 N. E. 900. Pay checks as money orders. "Strain cloth" supported by evidence of "strainer cloth" (State v. Underwood, 77 N. C. 502), and "calf skin" by "kip skin" (State v. Campbell, 76 N. C. 261). To describe a note as being for twenty-three hundred dollars when it was for twenty-three hundred dollars and interest and taxes is an immaterial variance. State v. Fenn, 41 Conn. 590. An indictment for stealing money is supported by evidence of taking a pocket-book or trunk containing the money. Berry v. State, 10 Ga. 511; U. S. v. Lee, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,586, 4 Cranch C. C. 446. But see Johnson v. State, 32 Ark. 181. An indictment for stealing and carrying away a horse is supported by evidence that he was ridden, driven, or led away. Applications of rule.— A sheet unnecessarily described as composed of wool must be proved to be made of wool; it is a variance if the sheet is part cotton. Alkenbrack v. People, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 80. So the marks on a pine log, unnecessarily alleged, must be proved. State v. Noble, 15 Me. 476. A charge of the larceny of a "Smith & Weston" revolver is not supported by evidence of the larceny of a "Smith & Wesson" revolver. Morgan v. State, 61 Ind. 447. So the charge of stealing "a certain United States currency note, commonly called a greenback bill, of the value and denomination of five dollars" is not supported by proof of the stealing of a "five dollar bill." Statum v. State, 9 Tex. App. 273. So it is unnecessary to describe money as "of the United States" but it must be proved when so described. Marshall v. State, 71 Ark. 415, 75 S. W. 584. "Buckskin gloves" is not supported by proof of "sheepskin gloves." McGee v. State, 4 Tex. App. 625. In the description "beef steer," the word "beef" is unnecessary, but it must be proved. Cameron v. State, 9 Tex. App. 332.

67. Hall v. State, 120 Ga. 142, 47 S. E. 519.

What is not a variance.— A hog was described as "black spotted" and it was proved that it was "black spotted" but "sandy colored generally"; this is not a variance. Cross v. State, 64 Ga. 443. So where an alleged red milch cow was shown to have white spots it is not a variance so long as the prevailing color is red. Kennon v. Territory, 5 Okla. 685, 50 Pac. 172. "Gray" is supported by evidence of "dark iron-gray." State v. Hill, 65 Mo. 84.

Extent and limits of rule.— Where a brand is described as "P. A. R.," proof of "P. R. A." was held a variance (Ranjel v. State, 1 Tex. App. 461), and where a brand was described as on the hips, proof that it was on the ribs was a variance (Priesmuth v. State, 1 Tex. App. 480). A slight variance in the connection of the letters in a brand is not fatal. Stoneham v. State, 3 Tex. App. 594. And where the brand was described as a script "e" and one witness said figure "9" and another a "q" there was no substantial variance. Sweat v. State, 4 Tex. App. 617.

So of the ear-marks on an animal; they need not be described, but if described they must be proved.[71] Where an indictment charged theft of an appearance bond by a surety to escape liability thereon, the surety was not guilty under the indictment, unless he took the bond for the purpose alleged.[72]

3. OWNERSHIP. A variance in the ownership of the property as alleged is fatal at common law.[73] Under statutes, however, an immaterial variance is not fatal.[74]

4. QUANTITY OR NUMBER. Quantity and number are not ordinarily essential to be proved as alleged; and a variance as to the number or quantity or goods stolen is not fatal to conviction. Thus where an indictment charges the taking of several articles of the kind named, the proof may show the taking of a less number.[75] So where the indictment alleges the taking of a certain quantity, it is established by proof of taking a smaller quantity;[76] or, since the greater includes the less, by proof of taking a larger quantity.[77] Where the indictment alleges the taking of several articles, it may be supported by proof of the taking of any one of them.[78] If, however, the punishment depends on the number of things stolen, proof of

E. 974). But where a horse was described as blemished in the left eye, and the blemish was in the right, the variance was not held fatal. Boyd v. Com., 59 S. W. 518, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1017.

Application of rule.— So on a charge of stealing "national bank currency and United States treasury notes" the jury may find stealing one of the articles described will not support a general verdict of guilty.[79] So where the indictment charges the stealing of several articles, and is defective as to some of the articles, it will nevertheless support a conviction for stealing those articles as to which the allegations are sufficient. This is true where some of the articles named are not subjects of larceny,[80] or are not properly or correctly described,[81] or where no value of them is alleged,[82] or the ownership is wrongly stated.[83] It is not necessary to prove the value alleged; but the goods may be proved of less value, provided the evidence shows the commission of the offense described.[84] The indictment need not describe all the articles taken by defendant at one time.[85] But it can only be supported by proof of taking one or more of the specific things described.[86] And where the indictment charged the taking of "one head of neat cattle" it could not be supported by evidence of the theft of two animals, neither of them identified with the one intended by the grand jury.[87]

5. Conviction on Indictment For Different Offense[88] — a. Conviction For Larceny on Indictment For Aggravated Offense. Under an indictment for aggravated larceny, such as larceny from the person or from the dwelling-house or for burglary or robbery, a conviction of larceny may be had if the aggravation is not proved,[89] or if it is insufficiently alleged in the indictment.[90] In the case of a statutory aggravation of larceny such a conviction cannot be had for petit larceny when under the statute no petit larceny could be committed under the circumstances charged,[91] and conversely under an indictment for larceny one cannot be convicted of a statutory offense which is petit larceny.[92] Nor can there be a con-defendant guilty if he stole either. State v. Henry, 24 Kan. 457. Contra, State v. Collins, 72 N. C. 144.

But an indictment for grand larceny, for stealing property of more than twenty-five dollars in value, is not sustained by proof of the theft of property of less than twenty-five dollars in value from the person, even though stealing from the person be grand larceny, regardless of the value of the stolen property, since grand larceny by stealing from the person is not described in the indictment. viction of grand larceny when the statutory offense charged is only a misdemeanor.[93] Upon this principle there can be no conviction of a crime not charged in the indictment, as of other property than that described.[94]

b. Conviction on Indictment For Larceny[95] — (I) Conviction For Different Crime. Under an indictment for larceny one cannot at common law be found guilty of a different offense, such as embezzlement,[96] obtaining by false pretenses,[97] receiving stolen goods,[98] or other new statutory offense kindred to larceny.[99]

(II) Conviction Where Evidence Proves Aggravated Offense. Under an indictment for larceny there may be a conviction, although the evidence proves the commission of a higher offense which includes larceny, as robbery or larceny from a dwelling-house.[1] And so where a specially severe punishment is provided by statute for larceny of an animal, one who steals an animal may be indicted and convicted of common-law larceny.[2]

XIV. EVIDENCE.[3]

A. Presumptions and Burden of Proof — 1. Proof Beyond Reasonable Doubt. As in all criminal cases, defendant cannot be convicted unless he has been proved beyond all reasonable doubt to have committed the offense.[4] The prosecution must establish each of the essential elements of the crime,[5] and that the goods in the possession of defendant were the identical goods alleged to have been stolen;[6] and where the evidence is consistent with defendant's innocence, he should be acquitted.[7]

2. Burden of Proof of the Offense. The burden of proof therefore does not shift to defendant no matter what presumptions may arise as to any element of the crime. So the prosecution must disprove beyond a reasonable doubt any asserted consent or authority of the owner for the taking.[8] So the prosecution must prove beyond a reasonable doubt in a prosecution for larceny by bailee that the person named in the indictment, and not another as asserted by the defendant, was the bailor.[9] The felonious intent to steal at the time of taking being one of the elements of the offense, the prosecution must prove the existence of the felonious intent beyond a reasonable doubt.[10] So where defendant admits the taking, but introduces evidence of intoxication, the burden of proving the felonious intent in spite of the intoxication is on the prosecution;[11] and the same thing is true where, admitting the taking, he alleges that the goods were taken under a claim of right.[12] In one case it was said that the burden of proving that because of insanity or intoxication defendant had no felonious intent was upon defendant.[13] In the very same case it had rightly been said that the burden of proving the intent is on the prosecution. The court probably meant that the burden of introducing evidence to raise a doubt was on defendant, because of the presumption, mentioned in the opinion, that a man intends to do what he does.

3. Burden of Proof of an Affirmative Defense. Where defendant sets up a real affirmative defense, the burden of proof should rest upon him.[14]

Thus where a defendant set up the statute of limitations, the burden of bringing his case within the statute was upon him, although if the time named in the statute had expired the burden of bringing in evidence that defendant had been absent and thus within an exception to the statute was upon the prosecution. Applications of rule.— Thus evidence that the prosecuting witness and others who had defendant in charge the night before the trial were drinking and playing cards was excluded; so were questions asked for the purpose of discrediting a witness by disputing his answers. Tabor v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. 631, 31 S. W. 662, 53 Am. St. Rep. 726. So on a prosecution for cattle theft committed in a particular county, evidence of the purpose of the accused in going to that county three years before the commission of the offense is irrelevant. People v. Green, 143 Cal. 8, 76 Pac. 649. So on a prosecution for stealing cattle from a certain range, the question whether the owner had cattle on another range was irrelevant unless it was claimed that the cattle alleged to have been stolen were there. People v. Green, 143 Cal. 8, 76 Pac. 649. So evidence that defendant's father owned hogs similar to those taken is immaterial. Ledbetter v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1895) 29 S. W. 479. So evidence that a third party, not in court, confessed to have committed the larceny is inadmissible. Daniel v. State, 65 Ga. 199. Evidence that defendant during the progress of the trial was indicted for receiving the property which he is on trial for stealing is inadmissible. Burns v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1901) 66 S. So the following evidence has been held inadmissible, that a stolen mule was seen in the pasture of defendant's father, without evidence to connect defendant therewith (Moore v. State, (Tex. Cr. W. 626); on trial for feloniously carrying away standing corn, the fact that the field was watched the night prior to the alleged crime (Newsom v. State, 107 Ala. 133, 18 So. 206); on a prosecution for cattle theft, evidence of the

the testimony, whether the stolen property or other thing, may be introduced in evidence and exhibited to the jury.[16] But it is not necessary to produce the stolen goods in court; they may be described by witnesses.[17] Although in some jurisdictions it appears to be necessary to account for the non-production of written instruments.[18]

b. Hearsay. The ordinary rules of hearsay apply in a trial for larceny. Mere hearsay cannot be shown,[19] even a declaration in articulo mortis.[20] Statements disposition of the animal after defendant's arrest and in his absence (Sapp v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1903) 77 S. W. 456); in a prosecution for horse theft, evidence as to what became of the horses after defendant's arrest (Clay v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 556, 51 S. W. 212); in a prosecution for larceny of money from a sewing-machine, evidence that defendant's mother had a similar machine (Childress v. State, 122 Ala. 21, 26 So. 162); on a prosecution for cattle theft, evidence that the brand was cut out of the hide after butchering, defendant not being implicated (State v. Huffman, 16 Oreg. 15, 16 Pac. 640); on an information for stealing a pocket-book dropped in a saloon, testimony as to what the complaining witness had done, at another saloon, in dropping his pocket-book and charging theft (People v. Long, 44 Mich. 296, 6 N. W. 673).

Evidence held relevant.— On the other hand evidence has been admitted as relevant in the following cases: On trial of an indictment for larceny of a horse, proof that he was accustomed to graze by day and return to his stable by night, but on the night in question did not return. On the trial upon a charge of hog stealing, testimony that the hog had been killed by the accused, and its carcass secreted, and that he subsequently sent another person to cut it in pieces and carry them to his house, is admissible, as showing a felonious asportation of the property after the theft had been first begun, by the taking of the living hog, and the concealment of its carcass after it had been killed. Where, in a prosecution for grand larceny of money from a cash register, a mutilated and alleged counterfeit coin was clearly identified as having been taken from the register at the time the crime was committed and was found on defendant's person when he was arrested a short time thereafter, it was properly admitted in evidence to connect defendant with the offense, although it was not "lawful money of the United States" which defendant was charged with taking. which are part of the res gestæ may be shown.[21] Evidence that a witness had given an account of the transaction on the day after the crime similar to that given at the trial cannot be introduced, where no evidence of a contradictory statement by the witness has been offered.[22]

c. Evidence of Other Crimes.[23] It is not permissible to show that defendant had committed other crimes as tending to show him guilty of the larceny for which he was indicted.[24] A fortiori evidence of an independent offense of some other person is immaterial.[25] In accordance with this general principle, evidence is inadmissible that defendant committed an independent theft, either before or after the one with which he is charged.[26] So the possession of other stolen goods cannot be shown.[27] The evidence offered is not objectionable on this ground if in fact it does not tend to raise suspicion of another crime.[28] In certain cases, however, where evidence of another crime is incidental to the proof of the crime in question it will be received. The evidence may be received as part of the res gestæ, when the two thefts were committed upon the same occasion,[29] or to prove the intent, when that is denied.[30] So resistance to arrest may be shown, although it involves the fact that in resisting defendant killed an officer,[31] and a former conviction may be shown to disprove good character.[32] Other instances in which evidence of other offenses was held admissible are set out in the notes.[33]

Under an indictment for larceny of tobacco, the property of R, it was competent for the prosecution to prove the loss of other tobacco in the neighborhood, to account for the fact that the quantity of tobacco found in the possession of defendants exceeded that lost by R, and it was not necessary to instruct the jury as to the purpose for which the testimony was admitted. d. Marks and Brands — (I) Identifying Marks on Goods in General. In establishing the identity of stolen goods, identifying marks may be proved. This may be done by actually introducing the goods as marked; and it has been held that testimony as to the marks cannot be introduced without producing the goods themselves or accounting for failure to do so.[34] But this application of the "best evidence rule" is not usually made in this country, and parol evidence of the marks may be freely introduced.[35]

(II) Marks on Cattle. Marks on cattle may be proved to identify the cattle and to prove the ownership.[36] Such marks do not need to be recorded in order to be admissible for any purpose for which they are competent.[37]

(III) Brands on Cattle. In several states brands may be duly recorded, and the recorded brand may be introduced to prove ownership; but by special provision of the statute an unrecorded brand cannot be admitted to prove ownership.[38] The recording of the brand can be proved only by the record itself;[39] but proof of any sort may be introduced to show that the animal in question bore the brand; as for instance pieces of hide which when placed together show the brand.[40] The statute requires that the part of the animal on which the brand is placed should be designated. It is not enough to designate two or more parts in the alternative,[41] but it has been held unnecessary to specify the side.[42] The brand may be assigned; and it is evidence of ownership of the owner of the brand, not of the one who originally recorded it.[43] A brand is not admissible to prove ownership which was not recorded until after the alleged taking.[44] So where two brands are recorded by the same person, neither can be admitted to prove owner-

Com., 58 S. W. 588, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 679. In a prosecution for cattle theft, testimony that defendant confessed to the witness that he had thrown poison into a yard on a certain date for the purpose of killing certain dogs which he was afraid would bark at him while going by with the cows in controversy, and so hinder the theft, is admissible as bearing on the offense charged, although it also shows a separate and distinct offense. Parker v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. 526, 67 S. W. 121. On indictment for larceny a witness for the prosecution who had feigned complicity in the crime was asked by the prosecuting attorney whether there had been a good deal of trouble from stealing in that vicinity. The answer tended to explain why the witness had feigned complicity. It was held that it could not have prejudiced the accused, as tending to prove him guilty of larcenies other than that with which he was charged. People v. Bolanger, 71 Cal. 17, 11 Pac. 799.

Road-brand.— Similarly where the statute provides that a road-brand must be placed on cattle and recorded before they are driven beyond the limits of the state, the record of a brand made after the removal of the cattle is unauthorized by law, and is inad-ship.[45] Evidence that two persons had recorded the same brand is admissible as tending to disprove ownership in one of them.[46] That the bill of sale of a stolen animal, executed by defendant, described the brand on the animal as different from the one used by the owner, does not render it inadmissible in a prosecution for the theft, but merely affects its weight.[47] Evidence of a brand on a cow claimed to be the mother of a stolen calf is not admissible in a prosecution for the theft of the calf.[48] Evidence of the state that a calf was branded with the owner's brand after its recovery from defendant, charged to have stolen it, is inadmissible in a prosecution for the theft.[49] Although an unrecorded brand cannot be admitted to prove ownership, it is admissible as evidence identifying the stolen property, the ownership being established by other testimony.[50] Therefore where an unrecorded brand is shown to have been used by the alleged owner defendant may show that it had also been used by another person, in order to raise a doubt as to the identity.[51]

e. Bill of Sale of Goods. A bill of sale of the stolen property may be admissible in evidence for several purposes. A bill of sale to the alleged owner may be introduced to prove ownership,[52] and a bill of sale to an independent third person may be introduced to disprove ownership in the alleged owner.[53] A bill of sale of the goods received by defendant at the time he took the goods is admissible in his behalf.[54] On the other hand, a bill of sale found in defendant's possession and shown to be a forgery is admissible against him.[55] A bill of sale of the goods given by defendant to a purchaser from him is admissible in his favor to prove bona fides.[56] On the other hand, a bill of sale given by defendant may be introduced in evidence against him.[57] The bill of sale is equally admissible in evidence, although not acknowledged and recorded.[58]

f. Acts of the Accused — (i) Evidence on Behalf of the State. The acts of defendant after the taking, so far as they have a bearing on the issue, are admissible in evidence. Thus evidence may be given of the flight of the accused after the theft.[59] So evidence is admissible that the accused surrendered the stolen property,[60] voluntarily paid its value,[61] was found going to the place where it was concealed,[62] absconded with the proceeds,[63] or cashed the draft paid for the stolen goods, which were known to have been sold after the theft.[64] Possession of implements for the commission of crime may be shown.[65] Concealment of the stolen goods by defendant may be shown,[66] and also his disposal of the property.[67] Evidence that defendant attempted to borrow money, after the larceny, is admissible, but not that another, not shown to be authorized by him, did so.[68] Evidence of attempts by the accused to intimidate a witness for the prosecution is admissible.[69]

(II) Evidence in Behalf of Defendant. Conduct of defendant may sometimes be shown in defense; as that he assisted an officer in pursuit of the stolen property.[70] So on a prosecution for stealing a heifer, where defendant claimed that he had lost a heifer and took the one in question in the belief that it was his, evidence is admissible that defendant had hunted for his heifer, and of his declarations while doing so.[71]

So where in a trial for larceny of a diamond ring, the evidence shows that while defendants were in the store of the prosecuting witness the ring was stolen, and an imitation diamond ring substituted for it, jewelry containing similar imitation diamonds, afterward found in defendants' possession, is admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing that defendants had the means of committing the crime charged. Where the proof of larceny is circumstantial, proof that defendant had an opportunity to put the stolen goods in the place where they were found is not rendered incompetent as incriminating evidence by proof that other persons also had such opportunity, since that circumstance merely weakens the probative force of the evidence. Padfield v. People, 146 Ill. 660, 35 N. E. 469. if freely made, are admissible against him.[74] But a confession is not admissible if when it was made defendant was acting under duress, or under promise of some advantage held out to him.[75] Where no promise was made to him, the mere fact that he hoped by confession to escape punishment does not render the confession inadmissible.[76] Nor does the fact that he believed one of the surrounding crowd to be an officer about to arrest him prevent the introduction of his statement.[77] Where two persons are shown to be engaged in a common design, the declarations of one may be admitted against the other.[78] Declarations of defendant before the theft are also admissible against him.[79] No declarations are admissible unless they are in some way relevant to the issue.[80]

(II) As Evidence in Favor of Accused.[81] Under some circumstances declarations of defendant may be shown in defense. Thus his explanation of his possession of the stolen goods may be shown.[82] But not declarations not connected with the possession of the property.[83] And where defendant in a prosecution for larceny defends on the ground of title to the property, declarations by him, while in possession of the property, as to his source of title, are not admissible in his favor as res gestæ.[84]

h. Incriminating Circumstances. Any circumstances which tend to connect defendant with the offense, and are not in themselves inadmissible, may be proved. Thus the pecuniary need of defendant before the theft may be shown to establish a motive for the taking,[85] and possession of money immediately after the theft may be shown;[86] and particularly evidence of the possession of more property after the theft than before is admissible as tending to show that defendant secured the stolen property.[87] If the evidence applies to possession of money a considerable time after the theft it is irrelevant.[88] Where two persons are shown to have been connected together in an enterprise, the conduct of each is admissible against all.[89] Where, however, two are jointly indicted, the conduct of one cannot be put in evidence against the other unless their connection in the enterprise is first established.[90] But on the trial of an indictment for larceny, evidence that a co-defendant led a witness to the stolen property is admissible to prove when and how it was found, without proving a conspiracy between the prisoner on trial and such a defendant.[91] Evidence that defendant had opportunity to commit the offense is admissible.[92] Other incriminating circumstances may be shown.[93]

Thus where on a prosecution for larceny, prosecutor testified that, shortly before missing the money stolen, he heard a noise in the back room of his store, and defendant's brother came out and gave him ten cents, saying that he had broken a lamp chimney, which was on the staircase in the back room, and that thereafter, on searching the brother, he stated defendant had given him certain money found on him, and defendant stated that he had paid for the lamp chimney, the testimony was admissible as tending to show defendant had been secreted in the store and broken the chimney when coming down stairs to escape, and given his brother the money to pay for it. Barker v. State, 126 Ala. 69, 28 So. 685.

93. Conley v. State, 21 Tex. App. 495, 1 S. W. 454.

Illustration.— Thus on a trial for larceny committed in a railroad car evidence that the conduct of the accused and his traveling companion had excited attention and notice of the passengers in the same car was admissible. Martin v. State, 67 Nebr. 36, 93 N. W. 161. In a prosecution for theft, a certain handkerchief and big bale tobacco sack, to both of which defendant had access at the time of the theft, were admissible in evidence, after being identified as the handkerchief and sack in which the stolen property was found concealed on defendant's property. Flores v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1901) 63 S. W. 330. On trial for the theft of cattle, it was legitimate to show that certain witnesses, who testified that they assisted in carrying off the cattle at defendant's suggestion, were brought to or near a pasture in question by defendant, or by horses furnished by him. Wright v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1898) 44 S. W. 151. It may be shown that defendant knew the cattle of the prosecutor (Wright v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1898) 44 S. W. 151), that he stated that the key of his corn-crib, in which the stolen goods were eventually found, was mislaid (Hubbard v. State, 107 Ala. 33, 18 So. 225), and that stolen hides were found in a certain culvert (Kennon v. State, 46 Tex. Cr. 359, 82 S. W. 518). So the state may show that the prosecuting witness at the time of the larceny was in a drugged condition, and particularly the peculiar effects of the drug administered. State v. Buckley, 72 N. C. 358. On the other hand it was error to admit evidence of gambling by defendant (Martin v. State, 104 Ala. 71, 16 So. 82); evidence that defendant and the person from whom he claimed to have received the stolen goods during a journey had quarreled while on the trip (State v. Broderick, 61 Vt. 421, 17 Atl. 716); evidence on a trial for horse theft that defendant had traded for a horse more than a month before the theft (Hart v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1897) 40 S. W. 495). So where defendant, on a trial for theft of cattle, claimed that he had bought them, evidence that he had borrowed money, stating at the time that he wanted it to pay for cattle, was immaterial, in the absence of evidence that he used the proceeds of the loan to buy the cattle which it was claimed that he stole. b. Consent of the Owner. Circumstantial evidence is admissible to prove non-consent of the owner, at least if the owner cannot testify,[97] as when he is dead[98] or a convict in prison.[99] If, however, the owner testifies at the trial, it has been held that he must directly state that he did not consent.[1] Evidence offered by defendant to show consent must be relevant,[2] and must not be mere hearsay.[3]

c. Motive. Proper evidence to prove motive may be introduced, as that defendant was in need of money to pay his debts,[4] that he had no apparent means of livelihood,[5] or that he believed he had been overreached by the owner.[6] So where the defense of kleptomania was set up on the trial of an indictment for the larceny of pocket-knives, it was competent for the prosecution to show for the purpose of establishing a motive on the part of defendant that he had been in the habit of making presents of pocket-knives prior to the time of the theft charged.[7] And having shown that defendant knew that the prosecutor had a considerable sum of money, the amount of it may be proved.[8] Evidence that one charged with larceny was reputed at the time to be a person of property is inadmissible in his defense.[9]

d. Intent — (i) Evidence in Behalf of State. Evidence is admissible which tends to show that the intent of defendant was felonious. Thus evidence that he made inquiries or was informed as to the ownership of the property before he took it may be admitted to show that he knew he had no right to it.[10] So evidence of similar previous transactions may be admitted to show intent,[11] but not evidence of dissimilar dishonesty.[12] Evidence of the conduct of defendant before the taking may be admissible to show his intent, as that he was seen a day or two before, riding through the owner's pasture looking at his cattle,[13] or that he had declared it would be easy to steal the goods.[14] So evidence of defendant's

Extent and limits of rule.— Thus proof that the property was stolen in another county, and subsequently found in defendant's possession in the county in which he is tried, warrants a finding that it was brought into the latter county by defendant. Lyon v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1896) 34 S. W. 947. Where there is direct evidence of defendant's possession of the stolen horse in an adjoining county, and circumstantial evidence of his taking the same in the county of the trial, a verdict of guilty is warranted. State v. Espinozei, 20 Nev. 209, 19 Pac. 677. conduct after the taking,[15] as concealing the goods taken,[16] denying them to the owner,[17] mortgaging them,[18] or taking a receipt in the name of his wife instead of the owner,[19] may tend to prove his intent; and so is advice of counsel to give the goods up to the prosecutor, but not reasons for such advice.[20] An accomplice of defendant may give direct evidence of the intent.[21] On a trial for theft of jewelry in the night from the owner's bed-chamber, evidence that a witness smelled chloroform in the chamber immediately after the theft was committed was admissible to prove intent.[22] On trial for theft of one animal, it was error to admit evidence that defendant had made no butcher's report to the county commissioners' court, as tending to prove too much, where it appears that he butchered over twenty head of cattle shortly previous to his arrest.[23]

(II) Evidence in Behalf of Accused. Evidence is admissible for defendant which tends to disprove the existence of the criminal intent.[24] Defendant himself may testify directly as to his intent,[25] and his declarations at the time of the taking, being part of the res gestæ, are admissible to prove an innocent intent.[26] Evidence is admissible that the owner owed defendant more than the value of the goods,[27] or that defendant made a mistake,[28] as that being a creditor of the owner he had been informed that the owner was willing to have him take the goods in payment.[29] So to disprove intent defendant may contradict the terms of a written agreement.[30] But the evidence must not be too remote.[31]

e. Value. The value of the property stolen may be shown by any competent evidence.[32] Opinion of value can be given only by an expert,[33] and the owner, not being an expert, cannot testify to the value of the goods to him.[34] But very slight knowledge will qualify a witness to testify to value.[35] The owner may state the price he recently paid for the goods.[36] Evidence of the market value of the goods at the place of taking is always admissible.[37] If a market value can be proved, evidence of any other sort bearing on the value is inadmissible.[38] If there is no market value at the place of taking, value in a neighboring market may be shown;[39] and if there is no market value, evidence of the actual value may be received.[40]

f. Ownership. The alleged owner may testify to his ownership.[41] Indeed it is sometimes asserted as an application of the best evidence rule that the alleged owner must testify or his absence be accounted for.[42] Declarations of ownership are excluded as hearsay, whether made by the alleged owner[43] or by the thief subsequent to the taking.[44] Long continued possession before the taking is prima facie evidence of ownership.[45] A judgment in a suit between defendant and the alleged owner is inadmissible, being res inter alios acta.[46] Evidence tending to show ownership in another person than the alleged owner is admissible.[47] Other cases in which evidence was held admissible on the question of ownership are set out in the notes.[48]

g. Identification of Property. An article cannot be introduced in evidence without identification.[49] The property alleged to have been stolen may be identified by ordinary evidence.[50] Goods alleged to be stolen may be produced in court and identified in the presence of the jury.[51] And the jury may examine the Extent and limits of rule.— On a prosecution of a Mexican for horse theft, testimony of the owner that the second evening before the theft three Mexicans passed through his lot, and that one of them looked like defendant, but that all Mexicans looked very much alike to him, is admissible for what it is worth. Trevenio v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1905) 87 S. W. 1162. So in a prosecution for theft of an overcoat, evidence by the wife of the prosecuting witness that when defendant disappeared from the residence the overcoat also disappeared, and that she was in an adjoining room, and did not notice defendant when he left, but the coat was hanging at the head of the bed in the room where defendant was immediately before leaving, and was not there after he left, and that she and defendant were the only persons in the house, was properly admitted, although elicited in answer to a question by defendant's counsel. Smith v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1903) 75 S. W. 298. And on a trial for the theft of a mule, the testimony of a witness that on the night of the theft defendant came to her house; that, on being refused admission, he went toward the road; that later she heard someone in the road say "Whoa!" and heard someone pass the road on horseback was admissible. Burch v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1905) 90 S. W. 168. State v. Waltz, 52 Iowa 227, 2 N. W. 1102. On trial for theft of cattle and for receiving stolen cattle, in separate counts, the testimony of certain witnesses that, on the first trial of defendant, they heard one C testify that he, C, and defendant stole the cattle, was properly admitted for the purpose of discrediting such witnesses by showing that defendant had them present at the former he and not defendant committed the larceny.[62] But evidence that the prosecuting witness agreed to stop the prosecution if defendant would restore the stolen property is inadmissible.[63] A witness cannot be discredited by asking her on cross-examination whether she is a common prostitute.[64]

j. Corroboration. Evidence revelant to corroborate an account given by the defendant may be admitted.[65]

k. Rebuttal — (I) Introductory Statement. Evidence in contradiction and rebuttal of competent evidence previously introduced by the other party is admissible.[66]

(II) Rebuttal by Defendant of Evidence in Chief. Evidence of an incriminatory circumstance may be discredited by circumstances in the case.[67]

Extent and limits of rule.— So evidence is admissible that upon being first found in possession of the stolen property he gave the same account that he gave upon the trial. Shelton v. State, 11 Tex. App. 36. So where defendant claims to have bought the property, evidence that he actually had the money to pay for it is admissible. Jones v. State, 49 Ind. 549. So where defendant claimed that the property found in his possession and alleged to be stolen was his own, and used by him as a sample in selling, evidence that he had at about that time sold such property to various persons was admissible. People v. Crapo, 76 N. Y. 288, 32 Am. Rep. 302 [affirming 15 Hun 269]. On the other hand, where the defense is that defendant bought the horse in question, evidence that before the theft he applied to a person to purchase a horse is inadmissible. Foster v. People, 18 Mich. 266. On a prosecution for larceny of money, where defendant was shown to have been in possession of about the amount stolen, evidence that a year or more before the theft he had received money for the sale of horses is too remote. State v. Rutherford, 152 Mo. 124, 53 S. W. 417. When on a trial for larceny of money, defendant testified that at some time not disclosed she had no money not honestly acquired, and that of the money she had she paid various sums to persons, from some of whom she took written receipts therefor, which she offered in evidence, it was held that they were immaterial evidence. Com. v. Cannon, 97 Mass. 337. Evidence may be introduced in corroboration of a confession of the accused. Churchwell v. State, 117 Ala. 124, 23 So. 72.

66. See infra, XIV, B, 2, k, (II), (III), (IV).

67. See cases cited infra, this note.

Applications of rule.— Evidence that footsteps led from defendant's house to the place of larceny may be rebutted by proof that defendant never had boots that would fit the footsteps. Stone v. State, 12 Tex. App. 219. Evidence that defendant placed the stolen goods under a certain table may be rebutted by testimony that a witness saw the table on the day mentioned and there were no such goods under it. State v. Concannon, 25 Wash. 327, 65 Pac. 534. Evidence that defendant offered to pay back the money alleged to be stolen may be explained by proving that defendant was a timid man and easily frightened. State v. Lewis, 136 N. C. 626, 48 S. E. 654. So where evidence was introduced to show that defendant took goods from an administrator, defendant might introduce the inventory and appraisement to show that no such goods had been inventoried. State v. King, 122 Iowa 1, 96 N. W. 712; Baker v. State, 11 Tex. App. 262. So upon a prosecution for stealing blacksmith's tools, defendant may introduce evidence that the prosecutor's shop had been burned, and in his written statement to the insurance company he stated that all his tools had been destroyed. Lewandowski v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. App. 511, 72 S. W. 594. Evidence that defendant slaughtered the calf in question in a secluded place may be explained by evidence that he did so at the request of a person to whom he had sold the carcass. Landers v. State, (Tex Cr. App. 1901) 63 S. W. 557. Evidence that defendant offered, soon after the theft with which he was charged, to loan a woman money, may be explained by showing that he was engaged to marry her. People v. Howes, 81 Mich. 396, 45 N. W. 961. On a trial for stealing money from prosecutor while drunk, the state having, as a basis for the argument that defendant was preparing to take it, shown that after taking it from prosecutor's pocket, at his request, to pay for the liquor, he, in putting it back, called the attention of the clerk to the fact, he, to explain this conduct, may show that prosecutor was in the habit of losing money while drunk, and wrongfully accusing people of stealing it, and that he knew of this habit. State v. Lewis, 133 N. C. 653, 45 S. E. 521. Defendant having been shown to have been present at the place of the larceny, he may introduce evidence that he went there for a legitimate purpose. State v. English, 67 Mo. 136. In an

Nevertheless evidence which is immaterial will of course not be admitted for this purpose.[68]

(III) Rebuttal by Prosecution of Evidence For Defense. When an explanation is given by defendant, it may be disproved by rebutting evidence,[69] and such rebutting evidence may be entirely circumstantial evidence;[70] but it must be otherwise admissible; and it has been held that stenographic notes of former testimony cannot be admitted for the purpose, since defendant could not meet the witness face to face.[71]

(IV) Rebuttal by Defendant of Rebutting Evidence of Prosecution. Where an explanation given by a defendant is rebutted by direct denial or otherwise defendant in sur-rebuttal may show circumstances tending to substantiate his own testimony.[72]

indictment for larceny, if a confession by defendant is introduced, tending to prove that soon after the larceny was committed he was in possession of a part of the stolen property, and gave the same to his mother, it is competent for him to prove in defense that his mother never had the property in question from him. Com. v. Howe, 2 Allen (Mass.) 153.

68. Allen v. State, 134 Ala. 159, 32 So. 318. Where, in a prosecution for grand larceny of money from a cash register, there was no evidence that defendant made any attempt to borrow money prior to the commission of the offense, evidence that defendant's credit was good and that he could have borrowed money was not admissible for the purpose of accounting for the money found on his person. People v. Peltin, 1 Cal. App. 612, 82 Pac. 980.

69. See cases cited infra, this note.

Applications of rule. — Where defendant claimed to have been acting in good faith for a third party, the prosecution may rebut by showing that the other party could not have had the goods (State v. Cameron, 40 Vt. 555), or would not have had dealings with defendant (Ellis v. People, 21 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 356), or that he could not have dealt with the other in good faith (Chambers v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1901) 65 S. W. 192), or by other circumstances (Com. v. Grose, 99 Mass. 423). Testimony of defendant that he always carried his money in his stockings might be met by evidence of a contrary habit. People v. Piggott, 126 Cal. 509, 59 Pac. 31. Testimony of defendant that he went to the place of larceny to check up his pay-rolls might be rebutted by evidence of the length of time required for such work. Dimmick v. U. S., 135 Fed. 257, 70 C. C. A. 141. Where the accused, as a witness in his own defense, testified that he purchased the harness described in the indictment, and placed it where it was found, with wire, for safekeeping, it is competent for the district attorney, on cross-examination, to ask him why he had placed wire, admitted by him to have been stolen, in the same place. State v. Schaffer, 70 Iowa 371, 30 N. W. 639. Evidence that defendant was an idler, and did not work half the time, is admissible to rebut the inference from evidence that he got the money for improvements on his house by honest work. Martin v. State, 104 Ala. 71, 16 So. 82. And evidence that defendant was in jail at about the time of the theft may be explained in rebuttal by fixing the date of the theft at a time when defendant was out of jail, although it is a different time from that named by the first witnesses, the time not being material. Turpin v. Com., 74 S. W. 734, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 90.

70. Barfield v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 19, 51 S. W. 908.

72. Kimball v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. 230, 39 S. W. 297, 66 Am. St. Rep. 799. And see cases cited infra, this note.

Applications of rule.—Where to show a taking by mistake of a colt defendant testified that W had sold and delivered him a similar colt, and the prosecution denied such delivery, evidence is admissible that W said he was about to take the colt to defendant. Herndon v. State, (Tex. App. 1892) 18 S. W. 551. And so where defendant claimed to have taken the horse in question by mistake, and the prosecution, to disprove good faith, introduced testimony that defendant had never reimbursed the person to whom he had sold the horse, the animal having been taken from the purchaser by the owner, defendant was entitled to show that he had reimbursed the purchaser. Sigler v. State, 7 Tex. App. 283. On the trial of an indictment for larceny, where the evidence established that defendant had borrowed the chattel to take it to a certain place, but had himself gone to another place, and sold it, and used the proceeds, defendant was allowed to put in evidence to the effect that he had previously arranged with another to go to the first place, but did not go because that other person was prevented by the sickness of his child from going with him. Grimes v. State, 68 Ind. 193. The brand of the party from whom defendant claimed to have obtained the alleged stolen animal was proved to be a horizontal "11." The brand on the animal was proved to be a perpendicular "11." Evidence was admissible to show that mistakes in the manner of applying the brand were frequently made by stockmen. Boren v. State, 23 Tex. App. 28, 4 S. W. 463.

C. Sufficiency of Evidence[73]— 1. General Principles as to Sufficiency — a. Circumstantial Evidence.[74] While a conviction may be had on mere circumstantial evidence, such evidence must be strong enough to exclude any reasonable hypothesis of innocence, to create a moral certainty of guilt, and to enable the jury to find the crime proved beyond a reasonable doubt.[75] Mere suspicion of guilt or tendency of the evidence to show guilt, or even probability of guilt, is not enough.[76] But a conviction for larceny will not be set aside merely because the evidence would not sustain a conviction for another crime.[77]

b. Evidence of the Corpus Delicti.[78] The corpus delicti, that is, the fact that a theft has been committed, must be satisfactorily established before there can be a conviction. This involves proof of two things: (1) That goods have been taken from the prosecutor; (2) that they were feloniously taken by someone. The corpus delicti may be established by purely circumstantial evidence.[79] So it is not necessary to call witnesses whose testimony taken together would directly negative an innocent taking.[80] The corpus delicti, it is usually held, cannot be proved by the uncorroborated confession of defendant.[81] But it may certainly be proved by a corroborated confession.[82] It must be sufficiently established by the evidence that the prosecutor lost the goods alleged to have been stolen from him. If on the evidence it cannot be found that the prosecutor has lost the property described, the corpus delicti has not been proved, and defendant must be acquitted.[83] This need not, however, be established by direct evidence of loss. Although no portion of the prosecutor's goods has been missed, it is a question for the jury, under all the circumstances of the case, whether the goods, which are the subject of the indictment, are his property.[84] If it appears that the prosecutor lost the goods described, there must be evidence that the loss was by a felonious taking in order that the jury may find the corpus delicti.[85] But evidence of felony, to justify conviction, need not be so strong as to prove conclusively that there was no possibility of a non-felonious taking.[86]

Applications of rule.— Evidence that the stolen property was claimed and surrendered does not suffice to prove either the fact of the theft or the ownership represented, even though supplemented by proof that the accused had avoided arrest. Jorasco v. State, 8 Tex. App. 540. And where goods are discovered which once formed part of the stock of a retail tradesman, evidence must make it appear that they were not sold by him in the course of trade before a larceny from him can be established. 86. Thus in a prosecution for horse stealing, where the evidence showed that the horse was put in the stable at night, and next morning was gone, and no evidence was introduced by defendant to show that the horse had merely escaped, the existence of a corpus delicti was sufficiently shown. State v. Rodman, 62 Iowa 456, 17 N. W. 663. Defendant and a companion were seen standing near the prosecuting witness, who was in a drunken sleep on a doorstep about three o'clock in the morning. They moved away, and, after stopping for a few minutes by a fence, went down the street. Witness was aroused, and his trousers pocket was found turned inside out. Before going to sleep his purse was in that pocket. The purse was found near the fence where defendant and his companion stopped. This evidence was sufficient to support the finding of a taking from the person, although the purse might possibly have dropped from the pocket. People v. Appleton, 120 Cal. 250, 52 Pac. 582. So on a trial for larceny, proof that complainant owned and had in his vest a watch; that in the presence of defendant he hung the vest up, with the watch in it; and that later, after he had put on the vest, he missed the watch, is sufficient evidence to establish the corpus delicti. People v. Davis, 19 N. Y. Suppl. 781. On indictment for the larceny of hogs, there was evidence that the owner of the hogs, hearing two reports of a gun and the squeal of a hog, hurried in the direction of the noise, and on reaching the place heard someone running; that he found two of his hogs dead, one with its throat cut; that defendant was that morning in the neighborhood, with a gun, on the pretense of duck shooting; that he hastily left the vicinity; that in the evening defendant told the owner he would tell him on Monday who did the shooting; and that on Monday he fled the country. This was sufficient evidence of the corpus delicti to go to the jury. Kemp v. State, 89 Ala. 52, 7 So. 413. Defendant was accused of stealing a mule which was missing from a pasture. Defendant was near the pasture shortly after the mule was missed, and three days later he was in a town forty miles away, where the mule was found. Defendant's witness testified that defendant assisted in driving the mule from the pasture to said town as a hired hand. There was sufficient proof of the corpus delicti. Tidwell v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 38, 47 S. W. 466, 48 S. W. 184. Defendant was indicted for the larceny of a hog, which with others was kept in a lot and disappeared during the absence of the owner, without breaking the inclosure. There was evidence that defendant and his wife had in their possession, about the time the hog disappeared, parts of the body of a hog which, in size and color of the hair, corresponded with what might have been obtained from such hog; that such meat, after being discovered, was put away and concealed by defendant's wife; and that they made false statements in regard to it. The question of corpus delicti was for the jury. Colquitt v. State, 61 Ala. 48.

c. Credibility of Witnesses.[87] The testimony of a witness may be successfully impeached by other facts and thus rendered insufficient to support a verdict.[88] On the other hand, where strong evidence for the defense was given by a brother of the accused, the weight of the evidence was affected by the relationship.[89]

d. Testimony of Accomplice.[90] At common law a conviction may be had on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice.[91] But in some jurisdictions because of statutory provisions no conviction can be had on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice; and this corroboration must extend to the connection of defendant with the act.[92] An accomplice may be confirmed by evidence not of itself sufficient for conviction.[93]

2. Proof of the Necessary Elements of the Offense — a. Time and Place. The time and place of the taking must be shown by evidence.[94]

b. Participation of Accused in the Act. No one can be convicted of larceny without sufficient evidence that he was himself connected with the taking.[95] And

A corroboration by the wife of the accomplice was held insufficient. Rex v. Neal, 7 C. & P. 168, 32 E. C. L. 555. It is probably now otherwise, since a wife is competent to testify against her husband. See State v. Sprague, 149 Mo. 409, 50 S. W. 901.

It is a question of fact for the jury whether a person is an accomplice. Cooper v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1898) 44 S. W. 1109; Riley v. State, 27 Tex. App. 606, 11 S. W. 642.

Proof that person was not an accomplice.— In a prosecution for horse theft, it was competent for the state to prove that witness was acting as a detective for the purpose of ferreting out the crime with which defendant was charged, or assisting in his detection and apprehension to show that he was not an accomplice and therefore would not require corroboration. Lightfoot v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1904) 78 S. W. 1075.

Extent and limits of rule.—As by evidence of admissions by the accused (Kent v. State, 64 Ark. 247, 41 S. App. 1898) 45 S. W. 494; Reg. v. Birkett, 8 C. & P. 732, 34 E. C. L. 989), not, however, by evidence of finding the goods in the house of defendant's father (Funderburg v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1896) 34 S. W. 613). Evidence confirming the accomplice in a matter connected with his own part only in the offense is not sufficient. Reg. v. Birkett, 8 C. & P. 732, 34 E. C. L. 989. But where the only corroboration was testimony of the wife of the accomplice and evidence of possession by the accomplice a conviction was affirmed. State v. Sprague, 149 Mo. 409, 50 S. W. 901.

Evidence held sufficient.— In a prosecution in K county for the theft of a horse, a deputy sheriff testified that he arrested defendant in K county, and that defendant then had the horse in his possession. The sheriff testified that he received defendant from the deputy's custody in K county. The prosecuting witness testified that the horse found in defendant's possession by the sheriff in K county was stolen from him in L county. The venue was sufficiently proved. Brown v. State, (Tex. in order to establish the guilt of an accused on the ground that he was an accomplice of another who was undoubtedly guilty, it is necessary to prove beyond reasonable doubt that he was a sharer in the crime.[96] The identity of the accused with the thief must be proved beyond reasonable doubt, like any other part of the case.[97]

c. Asportation — (I) Taking and Carrying Away. Evidence must be introduced sufficient to show a taking and asportation of the goods.[98] But direct evidence of the taking is not necessary.[99] The taking and asportation may be shown by circumstantial evidence.[1]

(II) Conversion. When larceny is committed by converting, secreting, withholding, or appropriating the property, such an act must be sufficiently established by evidence. An attempt to sell is sufficient evidence of appropriation.[2] So is evidence of pawning the goods.[3] But the mere fact that the property is not returned is not enough.[4]

d. Identity of the Property — (I) In General. A person may be convicted of larceny upon evidence connecting him with the theft, although the article stolen may not be identified, or even found.[5] But the evidence must refer to the property described in the indictment, and in that sense there must be an identification of the property stolen with that charged.[6] And when the evidence refers to property found in defendant's possession, it must be identified with that which was stolen.[7] The identity may be established by direct identification by the owner,[8] or by testimony as to peculiar marks or brands.[9] The identity may be established by circumstantial evidence.[10] But the evidence of identity must be sufficient to justify a verdict.[11]

(II) Animals. Where an animal found in defendant's possession is to be identified by its marks, the identification necessarily fails if there is a material variance.[12] The identification must be proved with reasonable certainty.[13] The identification may be established by circumstantial evidence.[14] But such evidence must establish the identity with sufficient certainty, otherwise it will not justify a conviction.[15]

defendant soon after the theft of money was in possession of money is not sufficient for identification of the latter with the stolen money,[18] and mere evidence that money found in defendant's possession was of similar denominations with that stolen without more is not sufficient identification.[19] But where the amount, kind, and denominations correspond, and access is shown, the identity is sufficiently established.[20]

e. Ownership — (i) Proof of Ownership. Ownership must be proved by sufficient evidence or the conviction cannot be supported.[21] Where the owner is alleged in the indictment as unknown, there can be no conviction unless it is proved that the grand jury did not know his name and could not discover it by due diligence,[22] as by showing that the cattle stolen were estrays.[23] So evidence that a certain person lost cattle like those stolen will not justify a verdict for stealing the cattle of a person unknown.[24] In the case of unknown ownership alleged, it is necessary to prove that defendant is not owner.[25] Where the ownership is differently laid in different counts, a general verdict of guilty may be found on evidence that the goods belong to some one of the persons named, without establishing the ownership of the particular one.[26] Proof of ownership of a corporation in the name by which it is commonly called is sufficient.[27]

(ii) Possession as Evidence of Ownership. Long continued undisputed possession in the alleged owner is sufficient evidence of ownership.[28] But mere apparent paper title is not necessarily enough.[29] Proof that property belongs to A and is in the possession of B will support an allegation of ownership in A.[30] But it will also support an indictment naming the possessor as owner.[31] ship may be proved by a legally recorded brand. A duly recorded brand affords prima facie evidence of ownership.[32] But the brand must correspond to the record, both in form and in place on the animal; and if it does not exactly correspond, the evidence is not of itself sufficient to prove ownership.[33] When animals belonging to the owner of the brand have been sold, the mere fact that the animal is branded does not prove ownership in the owner of the brand.[34] And the brand of one person is not sufficient evidence of the ownership of another who claims an animal as purchaser from the former.[35] By express provision of the Texas statute, an unrecorded brand is not sufficient proof of ownership,[36] and the same thing is true of a brand recorded after the theft.[37] But if there is sufficient evidence of ownership, it need not be shown that the brand is recorded.[38] An ear-mark need not be recorded in order to furnish evidence of ownership.[39] On indictment for stealing an animal, evidence that the brand on the animal had been changed, so as to make it resemble a brand claimed by defendant, without any evidence to show that defendant was concerned in altering the brand, or that he was connected in any way withthe stolen animal, is insufficient to justify a conviction.[40]

(IV) CLAIM OF OWNERSHIP BY DEFENDANT. Where defendant sets up ownership in himself, the evidence must be sufficient to disprove the claim beyond a reasonable doubt in order to justify a conviction.[41]

f. Non-Consent of the Owner. A conviction of larceny cannot be sustained unless there was evidence of the non-consent of the owner to the taking.[42] Where more than one person is interested in property, it is enough to show the non-consent of the one from whose possession it was taken.[43] In one state, however, because of the peculiar doctrine that the owner and possessor must both be named in the indictment, the non-consent of both must be proved.[44] In some jurisdictions the non-consent of the owner must be proved by his own evidence, if that is obtainable.[45] Although where the owner's testimony cannot be had, his non-consent may in these states be inferred from circumstances.[46] And objection must be made to evidence when offered as circumstantial.[47] On the other hand, in other jurisdictions the non-consent of the owner may in all cases be proved by circumstantial evidence.[48]

g. Value — (I) Necessity of Proof of Value. It is usually held that no conviction can be had unless the property stolen is affirmatively proved to be of some value,[49] but in a few states value may be inferred without any direct evidence on the point;[50] and it is not necessary to prove any precise value; it is enough to show that it was of some value, at least to the owner.[51] In petit larceny and in several statutory forms of larceny value is not material; and on an indictment for one of these offenses it is not necessary to prove any particular value, only that the article is of intrinsic worth.[52] Where larceny of a check for a certain amount is charged, no proof of its actual value is required, the law presuming that the face value is its actual value.[53]

Illustrations.— The jury are warranted in finding that a horse is of some value, upon evidence that he was a dark sorrel horse, weighing about nine hundred pounds, had a long tail, and was driven a long distance (Com. v. McKenney, 9 Gray (Mass.) 114), or upon evidence that a witness went one hundred miles to hunt the horse, and that the horse traveled one hundred miles back again (Houston v. State, 13 Ark. 66). So the proof of value of the stolen property may be inferred from the fact that a sum of money was put to the credit of the accused by the firm to whom he sent the property

The value to be proved is that at the time and place of the larceny.[55] The value proved may exceed the amount alleged.[56] Permission to prove the value in United States currency is not error.[57] Evidence of value by mere opinion of a witness is not sufficient unless he is shown to possess knowledge on the subject.[58] Very vague estimates of value are, however, allowed to go to the jury.[59] Evidence of the price obtained for the goods either before or after the larceny is sufficient proof of value.[60]

(III) Value of Money and Notes. The value of United States coin need not be proved,[61] and the same thing is true of genuine United States treasury notes or greenbacks.[62] It is often so provided of other bank-notes by statute.[63] Other bank-notes are required to be proved genuine notes in order to establish their value.[64] This may be done by the testimony of a business man who knows the fact.[65] The value may be proved without evidence of genuineness.[66] The ordinary method of proving value of a bank-note is to prove its actual circulation as currency.[67] But the fact that a witness for the prosecution, who was a broker, had exchanged the bills alleged to have been stolen, giving other money for them, after the larceny, but who did not speak of any former knowledge of such bills, or express any belief as to their genuineness, is no evidence that the bills were genuine.[68]

h. Intent — (i) Necessity of Proof of Intent. The felonious intent must be proved to the satisfaction of the jury. The existence of the felonious intent is a question for the jury.[69] If upon the evidence the jury is not justified in finding the existence of the felonious intent, a conviction cannot be sustained.[70]

(ii) Evidence of Intent in General. Where defendant who claims to have taken the property innocently gave false accounts of the taking, it is evidence from which the jury may find the felonious intent.[71] Sufficient evidence to justify a finding of felonious intent also exists where defendant attempted to conceal the goods or to escape with them, and denied possession of them.[72] If the taking was open and notorious the presumption is against an intent to steal, and there must be an acquittal unless there is some positive evidence of such an intent.[73] But if such evidence is given the intent is proved.[74] But a secret and clandestine taking of another's property, without explanation, may be found felonious.[75]

(iii) Lost or Mislaid Property. Where lost property is found, and is converted by the finder to his own use, and the property is so marked as to be capable of identification, proof of the possession and of the immediate subsequent conversion is admissible to establish the felonious intent.[76] So where the evidence showed that accused found the property described as having been stolen, and knew it to be the property of the rightful owner, and retained it with the express purpose of converting it to his own use, his conviction of simple larceny was not to be set aside.[77]

(iv) Claim of Right. A claim of right which is sufficiently proved by the evidence is enough to prevent conviction.[78] But an alleged claim of right may be disproved by circumstances.[79]

(v) Mistake. If goods are taken under a mistake, defendant believing that they are his own, this if established as probable will prevent conviction.[80] And this is stronger if the taking was by a servant or employee of the supposed owner, who had no interest in the goods.[81]

(vi) Subsequent Conduct. The intent at the time of taking may be sufficiently proved by subsequent conduct of defendant.[82] On the other hand a sufficient explanation of the subsequent conduct leaves the intent without sufficient proof.[83]

3. Proof by Particular Kinds of Evidence — a. Opportunity. Evidence of sole opportunity to commit the crime is enough to justify conviction,[86] and evidence of access by defendant to the stolen goods, with other suspicious circumstances, may justify a conviction.[87] But mere opportunity, not exclusive without other circumstances pointing clearly to defendant as guilty, is not sufficient to justify conviction.[88]

b. Evidence of Tracks. Tracing the stolen goods by footsteps, tracks of animals, or other tracks to defendant's house, with other circumstances, is often enough to sustain a conviction.[89] But where such tracks are not necessarily connected either with the larceny or defendant they are not alone enough to justify a conviction.[90]

D. Evidence of Possession of Stolen Property — 1. Possession as Evidence of Guilt — a. General Principles. The authorities are in conflict as to whether mere recent possession of stolen property is evidence against the accused. In many jurisdictions the mere fact of recent possession is evidence against the possessor.[91] In other jurisdictions unexplained possession is evidence against the possessor.[92] In California the authorities appear to be in conflict.[93] It is probable that the apparent conflict between these views is less important than it seems. Although in many states stress is laid on the point, most jurisdictions are probably really in accord in holding that evidence of recent possession may be received for what it is worth, but that it is worthless unless supported by other evidence; and failure to account for the possession is such evidence. The effect of recent possession is the same in a prosecution for larceny from the person as in one for simple larceny.[94] So of larceny from a building, where there was no doubt that the goods were taken from a building.[95] And so of burglary, where the theft proved was in connection with an act of burglary.[96]

b. Independent Evidence of Corpus Delicti Required.[97] Possession of another's property is not in any way evidence that the possessor stole it, where there is no independent evidence of any theft,[98] or identification of the property by independent evidence with that stolen.[99] The rule that the possession of stolen property, without explanation, is evidence of larceny does not apply where the circumstances under which the party acquired possession are proven.[1] Where defendant's possession was shown to have been obtained from a common carrier at a distance from the place of taking it raises no presumption against him.[2]

c. Possession of Part of the Stolen Property. Possession of part of the stolen property is under ordinary circumstances evidence of stealing the whole;[3] as of the unexplained possession by defendant of box and wrapper in which the stolen goods had been packed.[4]

d. Proof of Possession. Whether defendant was in possession of goods which were found is a question for the jury.[5] Where defendant pastured cattle for prosecutor, and the cattle escaped and returned to him, together with two others which defendant sold as his own to him, these facts tended to show possession on defendant's part of the two cattle thus sold by him.[6] And where goods formerly stolen from one person were found by another, and while in the latter's possession were exactly described by defendant, who claimed to have lost them, there is evidence of possession by defendant.[7] On the other hand there is not sufficient evidence of defendant's possession where it is shown that the goods were carried away on his team;[8] that he was seen walking behind a wagon in which they were carried away;[9] that they were found in a room jointly occupied by him and another,[10] or in a room occupied by him, but not under his control;[11] or that they were in possession of his servant.[12]

2. Weight of the Evidence — a. Possession as Raising a Presumption of Guilt. When a person is found in possession of recently stolen property, it is usually held that the burden of accounting for such possession rests upon him,[13] or as it is commonly put, that the possession of itself raises a presumption against the accused, which will justify conviction if he does not meet it by a reasonable explanation.[14] The same presumption arises when defendant points out the place of concealment of the property.[15] The force of the presumption is not affected by the fact that a state or county line intervenes between the place of theft and the place of finding.[16] The force of the presumption changes according to the nature of the property. Thus the possession of stolen money of a kind rarely found in circulation is much stronger evidence than that of ordinary money.[17] In several jurisdictions, however, evidence of the possession of recently stolen property is not enough by itself, without any other facts whatever, to support a conviction.[18] In a few states by statute one found in possession of stolen cattle has the burden cast upon him.[19] But this is really only the burden of giving an explanation, and whether the explanation is satisfactory is a question for the jury.[20]

b. Presumption Not Conclusive. Whatever be the law as to the presumption of guilt, it is everywhere agreed that the presumption is one of fact, not of law; the jury must pass on all the evidence.[21] And it is error to charge that there is a legal presumption of guilt, or that the law presumes guilt.[22] And the weight to be given to such evidence is for the jury alone; under no circumstances is the presumption conclusive.[23] It is error in some states to charge that it is presumptive evidence, or creates a prima facie case. Such instruction is illegal as an instruction on the weight of evidence.[24] So it is error to charge that possession is a strong criminating circumstance, in jurisdictions where a charge on the weight of evidence is forbidden.[25] It is error in such jurisdictions even to charge that it is a criminating circumstance tending to show guilt.[26] But it has been held that a charge that "the law presumes," while technically wrong, is not cause for reversal if the whole charge makes it clear that the presumption is not conclusive, and the jury is to consider all the evidence.[27] For the same reason defendant cannot have a charge that mere evidence of possession without more will not justify conviction; it is a charge on the facts.[28] The jury should be instructed as to presumption.[29]

c. Effect of Unexplained Possession. In almost all jurisdictions unexplained possession justifies a conviction.[30] In a few jurisdictions recent possession, unexplained either by direct or by circumstantial evidence, including evidence of character, is conclusive of guilt.[31] There is no presumption when there is no opportunity to explain the possession. Where under the circumstances of the case the possession, while tending to prove some other crime, like receiving stolen goods, does not indicate a taking by defendant, it cannot be relied upon to support a conviction.[32]

d. Effect of Possession in Connection With Other Evidence. Evidence of possession accompanied by evidence of other suspicious circumstances justifies a conviction.[33]

3. Explanation of Possession — a. General Principles. When one is found in possession of recently stolen property, but gives an explanation of his possession which seems reasonable to the jury, the possession ceases to have any evidentiary value and raises, either alone or in connection with other circumstances, no presumption of guilt; if the crime is proved, it must be done by other evidence altogether.[34] If, however, the explanation of his possession given by defendant

Application of rule.— Therefore an instruction that a defendant must "satisfactorily" explain his recent possession is erroneous. Van Straaten v. People, 26 Colo. 184, 56 Pac. 905; Hoge v. People, 117 Ill. 35, 6 N. E. 796.

establish the falsity of it beyond a reasonable doubt.[37] The prosecution is not required to do this, as a matter of law, in any particular way, as by calling the person from whom the prisoner claims to have obtained the goods.[38] A common explanation of possession given by the thief upon discovery is that he bought the goods from an unknown person. This explanation is entitled to little weight with the jury, or with the court which is passing on the facts.[39] The explanation may be so improbable that even if not contradicted by evidence the jury will misbelieve it; the reasonableness of it is for the jury.[40]

c. Reasonableness For the Jury. Whether the explanation is reasonable is for the jury.[41] And a reasonable explanation will not necessarily lead to acquittal.[42] Even if a reasonable account is given, the question of guilt is still entirely for the jury, and defendant is not entitled to an instruction that the prosecution must show the account to be false.[43] And if the explanation is false, the presumption is against the accused,[44] although his guilt cannot be found on that fact alone, in a state where unexplained possession alone will not justify conviction.[45]

d. Proof of Explanation — (i) By Declarations of Defendant. A statement made at the time defendant is discovered in possession of the goods, in explanation of his possession, is admissible in evidence a part of the res gestæ.[46] Such

Illustration.—Where defendant was charged with the theft of three head of cattle, in his possession, and the first notice he had that the cattle were claimed by another was by the service of a writ of sequestration, a statement by him, made to the officer serving the writ, to the effect that defendant claimed a statement is admissible as well against as for defendant.[47] If defendant's possession has ceased before discovery, his declarations when first charged with the offense are admissible.[48] Corroboration of defendant's statement is admissible if the truth of his explanation is controverted,[49] but not if it is uncontradicted.[50]

(II) By Other Evidence. It is open to defendant to explain his recent possession by any evidence bearing upon the question, even though he gave no explanation at the time he was found in possession.[51] Testimony of a witness who was present at the time defendant claimed to have paid for the property is admissible to prove the fact of payment, and also defendant's declarations made at that time as to the account upon which the payment was made.[52] And a refusal to allow the prisoner to testify as to the conversation that took place between himself and another, from whom he claims to have received the property stolen, tending to show that he did not know that it was stolen property, is error.[53] Where defendant has given a reasonable explanation of his possession of the property which he is charged with stealing, the state does not disprove his explanation merely by showing that a witness who gave additional testimony in support of it had previously made inconsistent statements.[54] On the other hand, where on the trial of an indictment for entering a house and stealing therefrom a coat, it was shown on the part of the government that the coat had been stolen at a particular time, and soon afterward was seen on the back of defendant, evidence showing that it was common for workmen in the vicinity to buy second-hand coats had too slight bearing on the issue to be admissible.[55] And a defendant will not be allowed to show that several days after the theft he told persons who proposed to buy the property that he would not sell it because it was not his, and that he intended to give it to the owner when called for.[56]

4. Personal and Exclusive Possession. Possession of defendant must be personal and exclusive, for the reason that such possession alone indicates that the goods have come to the possessor by his own act, or with his consent.[57] So also there is no presumption where the goods are found on the premises of the prisoner, but in an open building to which many others had access,[58] or in the open only two of the cattle, and that he had driven the other away several times, but that it had returned, is admissible. Hodge v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 229, 53 S. W. 862.

Use of part of stolen property.—In a prosecution for theft, part of the stolen property, consisting of barbed wire, was found in a building on defendant's place, over which he exercised a personal supervision, although it was occupied partly by others also. Defendant, when arrested, was building a fence with some of the wire, and told the officer who seized it that he bet he would bring it back. The evidence showed sufficient possession of the property by defendant to warfield,[59] or in a room in a hotel to which servants had access,[60] or in a trunk to which other persons had been.[61] It may be a joint possession,[62] and evidence of possession in one is evidence against both.[63] But possession of a companion, although the two were together before the theft, is not enough.[64] Property found in a house occupied exclusively by defendant and his wife is sufficiently traced to defendant's possession.[65] Similarly possession in defendant's wife may be shown.[66] But it cannot be shown that the goods were found in a house occupied by his wife and daughter; the possession in that case is merely constructive.[67] Possession in defendant's son is not evidence against defendant, unless it is proved that the son obtained the goods from defendant.[68] And so possession in defendant's father is not admissible against defendant.[69] If, however, a connection is shown between the son and the father, or even if the son lives in the father's house, the evidence is admissible and the weight of it is for the jury;[70] and so where goods were found in the house of defendant's sister.[71] Evidence that stolen goods were found in defendant's bedroom, in the drawer of a bureau, containing only men's clothing, in a purse under a paper covering the bottom of the drawer, is sufficient to show a conscious, exclusive possession by defendant, a man, although the room was also occupied by two women, especially where defendant, when arrested, was in the company of another man, charged to be his confederate, on whom a portion of the stolen goods were found.[72]

5. Recent Possession. In order to warrant a presumption of guilt the possession must be recent.[73] Whether possession is recent is generally speaking for rant a conviction. Pitts v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1895) 30 S. W. 359.

But evidence that prosecutor lost certain marked hogs; that he found them in a pen near defendant's house; that they had been re-marked and an attempt made to obliterate the former marks, which, however, partly remained; and that they also had the flesh marks of prosecutor's hogs, is sufficient to sustain a conviction of defendant of the theft. the jury, and depends on the circumstances of each case.[74] Possession not recent enough to raise a presumption may nevertheless be shown in evidence, to be considered for what it is worth, along with other evidence.[75] Possession will raise a presumption of guilt in the case of property which does not readily pass from hand to hand at a time more remote from the theft than in the case of property readily transferred.[76] Where there is no other evidence against defendant, remote possession will not justify sending a case to the jury.[77]

6. Possession of Other Stolen Goods. Possession may be shown of other goods stolen at the same time as those which defendant is accused of stealing.[78] This is true even if the goods belonged to another owner, if they were all taken at the same time.[79] Such evidence is not admissible without evidence that the other goods were stolen, and that they were taken at the same time.[80] Such evidence may be relevant to prove the identity of the accused, to identify part of the property with that described in the indictment,[81] to establish the intent,[82] to show exclusive possession,[83] or as one of the circumstances of finding the property.[84] Evidence is also admissible of the finding of goods stolen at a different time, where the two felonies were connected together and form part of a series of transactions.[85] And it has been held that evidence of finding a number of things recently bought by defendant is slight evidence of possession of stolen money which it is claimed was used to buy them.[86]

XV. TRIAL.[87]

A. Province of Court and Jury.[88] The jury are judges of the facts and the inferences from them, and the court should not interfere with their action.[89] All controverted questions of fact must be left to the jury.[90] They should be left to consider whether defendant was present at the taking;[91] whether he had a motive for the taking;[92] whether he took with felonious intent,[93] or under a bona fide claim of right;[94] whether the property has been properly identified;[95] and in general any question as to the weight of evidence.[96] But the jury should not be left to decide the law, or to determine any question which is for the court to determine.[97]

B. Instructions[98] — 1. Instructions in General — a. Applicability to Issues and Evidence. The court is not bound to give instructions stating a mere abstract proposition of law.[99] But the charge of the court must respond to every issue raised by the evidence.[1] A refusal to charge on elements not raised in the evidence is proper,[2] and it is error to charge on elements not raised in evidence, if such charge is prejudicial to defendant.[3] The charge must not go outside the indictment,[4] and where there is more than one count the court must state separately the law applicable to each.[5] It is error to limit the jury to the consideration of a question not embraced within the indictment,[6] or to direct the attention of the jury away from the real issue.[7] Provisions of law which incidentally affect the issue must be explained to the jury.[8]

b. General and Specific Instructions. Where the general instructions contain all the elements of theft defendant is not entitled to specific instructions;[9] but where the proof shows larceny from the person, it is proper to instruct specifically;[10] and in such case it is not error to fail to define theft generally,[11] or to add to the specific instructions that it is not necessary for the state to prove that no force was used.[12] Where a defense is adequately presented by the instructions, it is not error to refuse a more specific charge.[13] But the defense of kleptomania calls for a specific instruction.[14]

c. Misleading and Prejudicial Instructions. Instructions which mislead the jury are erroneous,[15] and so are instructions which prejudice the jury against defendant.[16] If, however, the charge is favorable to the accused, there is no error in it of which he can complain.[17]

2. Instructions as to Particular Elements of the Offense — a. General Definition of the Offense. Instructions defining the crime of larceny should state that defendant feloniously stole the property of another without his consent.[18] An instruction defining larceny in the language of the statute is sufficient.[19]

Applications of rule.— On one's trial for theft of sheep, an instruction to acquit if he in good faith bought them, but that a fraudulent sale would be no defense, was fatally misleading; since the jury might have understood the meaning to be that a sale fraudulent on the part of the seller merely would be no defense. Dreyer v. State, 11 Tex. App. 631. So where, on a prosecution for cattle theft, defendant claimed that he purchased the cattle, an instruction that if the proof merely connected defendant with the property subsequent to the taking, and the jury so believed beyond a reasonable doubt, they should find him not guilty, is misleading and confusing. Sapp v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1903) 77 S. W. 456.

Instructions not objectionable under rule.— An instruction that if the horse was running at large, and was regarded as an estray in the neighborhood, and if the jury believed "from the evidence" that defendant took possession of him, "or exercised such ownership over him as owners of live stock usually exercise over the same," with intent to steal the horse, defendant was guilty, was not subject to the objection that, as there was no evidence of how ownership was exercised over stock in the community, the jury might believe a claim of ownership over the horse while it was on the range would constitute theft; since the instruction referred to the evidence, and the only evidence of ownership was of the bridling and leading the horse from the range to defendant's premises, and there using and claiming him. Bennett v. State, 70 Ark. 43, 66 S. W. 198, 914. In a prosecution for larceny the court instructed that recent possession of stolen goods was a circumstance tending to prove guilt, in weighing which the jury should consider "the lapse of time since the property was taken, the character and nature of the property taken . . . and the demeanor and character of the accused. Defining larceny generally.— In a prosecution under Code, § 3907, providing that if any person finds personal property of which he knows the owner, and unlawfully appropriates the same, he is guilty of larceny,

b. Time and Place of the Offense. The jury should be charged that in absence of proof of time or place of stealing they cannot convict.[20] An instruction that the state is not required to prove the exact time laid in the indictment is good.[21] When it is applicable to the evidence, an instruction that where defendant stole property in one county and brought it with felonious intent to steal into another county, he is guilty of larceny in the latter county is not prejudicial to defendant;[1] but where the jury had reasonable doubt as to the ownership of the animal in the county of first taking, an instruction to acquit was improperly refused.[2] Where the evidence was that horses were herded in a ranch in Coahuila, it was sufficient to support an instruction as to theft in Coahuila.[3]

c. Taking and Asportation of the Property. Defendant is entitled to a charge on the necessity of taking and carrying away the property if the evidence raises the question.[4] Where there is evidence of delivery, defendant is entitled to a charge thereon.[5] And so where there is evidence of two separate takings,[6] or where there is some doubt as to defendant's presence at the original taking.[7] An instruction that if property was not taken by defendant but received by him the jury it is not error to give the definition of larceny generally as contained in section 3902, as the legislature did not intend by the enactment of section 3907 to create a distinct crime, but to declare a rule of evidence, which, being fulfilled, constitutes the crime as defined in the latter section, and particularly as there was evidence from which the jury might have found defendant guilty of larceny independent of said section 3907. State v. Hayes, 98 Iowa 619, 67 N. W. 673, 60 Am. St. Rep. 219, 37 L. R. A. 116.

Curing error by subsequent instructions.—Although, on a trial for grand larceny committed in the execution of a bunco game, the court read to the jury section 332 of the Penal Code, which has reference to fraudulently obtaining money by device, trick, etc., the error was cured by the following charges to the effect that the person obtaining money from another by fraud or artifice, with the intention of stealing it — the owner not intending to part with his title — is guilty of larceny. People v. Shaughnessy, 110 Cal. 598, 43 Pac. 2.

Miscellaneous instructions on statutory larceny.—Where the statute defines theft from the person as a theft committed without knowledge of the person from whom the property is taken or so suddenly as not to allow time to make resistance, an instruction that to convict the proof must show that the property was taken so suddenly as not to allow time for resistance did not include an instruction of taking without knowledge. Mathis v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1901) 65 S. W. 523. An instruction making felonious intent an ingredient of an offense is error where the statute does not require it. Carl v. State, 125 Ala. 89, 28 So. 505. Where the indictment alleges property was taken so suddenly, etc., an instruction to find defendant guilty if he took so suddenly, etc., or without knowledge, is ground for reversal, although no exception is taken. Swartz v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1894) 27 S. W. 136. Where the indictment for larceny is under the statute defining the crime of grand larceny, as taking property by stealth or fraud, an instruction that the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the property was taken by fraud or stealth is proper. 4. In a prosecution for larceny, an instruction offered by defendant that "the possession must be personal and exclusive, and must be such as to preclude the inference that the stolen property was in the possession of any other person than the defendant," was properly modified by striking out the part following the word "exclusive," and adding in lieu thereof, "or it must be the possession of some person or persons by the consent and will of the accused, and in either case the possession must involve a distinct and conscious assertion of possession by the accused." must acquit is a sufficient instruction as to the necessity of his presence at the taking.[8] Where there is sufficient evidence to sustain a conviction of defendant, defendant is not entitled to an instruction that there was no evidence that defendant and not another took the property.[9]

d. Value of the Property. Where the value of the property alleged to have been stolen is immaterial, it is not necessary to charge on the question of value,[10] or where the value of the property is proved beyond a reasonable doubt it is not error to assume the value of the property in an instruction.[11] In the larceny of a bank-check the question of value is for the jury and it is error to instruct them that the check is presumptively of some value where the maker has funds in the bank to meet it.[12] In an indictment for larceny of United States notes the refusal to instruct the jury that they must be satisfied of the genuineness of the notes is ground for a new trial.[13] Where the owner cannot testify as to the value of the stolen article it is error to instruct the jury that the value of the property is to be estimated by its value to the owner.[14] It is not error to instruct the jury that in finding value they are not confined to the price second-hand dealers would pay for the property or sell it for.[15]

e. Ownership—(i) In General. Where the evidence raises the issue the accused is entitled to a charge that unless the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the ownership is proved as laid in the indictment they should acquit.[16] Failure to instruct on ownership is not error where the evidence does not raise the issue.[17] It is error for the court to assume ownership,[18] or that defendant was not owner,[19] but assumption consistent with the defense is not error.[20] It is sufficient instruction on ownership for the court to state that the jury must believe the property in question was the property of the alleged owner.[21] An instruction that it is not necessary for the alleged owner to testify as to ownership is proper where ownership is otherwise established.[22] But an instruction that where the owner would not swear positively to the property being his there should be an acquittal was properly refused.[23]

(II) Possession. The jury should be instructed that possession should be proved as laid in the indictment.[24] It is not error to refuse to charge on possession where the servant's custody is the master's possession.[25] Control exercised by a son under the father's direction did not require an instruction on the theory that the son was a special owner.[26] It is sufficient instruction on possession to state that the jury must find that the owner, or other person alleged in the indictment to have had possession, had possession or had control and management.[27] The word "actual" possession or control need not be used.[28]

(III) Brands. Where the statute provides that no unrecorded brands shall be recognized as evidence of ownership the jury should be so instructed.[29] It is the duty of the court to limit the effect of an unrecorded brand to the question of identity.[30] A charge to that effect is, however, unnecessary where the ownership is undisputed.[31] An instruction as to the effect of a recorded brand as evidence is error as being on the weight of evidence.[32]

f. Consent of Owner. When a taking by consent of the owner is asserted, the jury should be instructed that defendant must be acquitted if he took with the owner's consent.[33] But when theft has been properly defined in the general charge, a failure to include the want of consent of the owner, if no issue as to the

Sufficient instruction as to consent.—Where, in a prosecution for burglary and larceny, the court charged that if defendant unlawfully and forcibly did break and enter into the building of G "with the intent to steal therein," and the succeeding instruction declared that if the jury believed and found that defendant unlawfully and forcibly both broke and entered the building of G, as defined in the first instruction, and there took the property alleged, and did so with the intent to fraudulently convert the same to his own use, etc., the second instruction was not objectionable for failure to require the consent of the owner has been raised, will not be error.[34] Where there was no evidence of consent a charge on the theory that there was consent was properly refused.[35] An instruction to acquit if defendant took with the prosecutor's consent, etc., was sufficient as bearing on defendant's claim that he had prosecutor's consent.[36] If it is admitted that defendant obtained the property with the consent of the owner, an instruction authorizing conviction if property was obtained without consent is erroneous.[37]

g. Intent — (I) In General. Instructions defining the crime of larceny must contain the elements of felonious intent or fraud.[38] If this element of felonious intent is sufficiently expressed otherwise the word feloniously or fraudulently need not be used,[39] but if the charge is made that larceny is complete on the act of fraudulent or felonious taking, the charge is erroneous for there may be fraudulent takings that are not larceny.[40] The meaning of the word "felonious" need not be explained when used in an instruction.[41] Fraudulent or felonious intent is sufficiently defined as a taking without consent of the owner, and with intent to deprive him of the property.[42] When the evidence tends to exonerate the accused he is entitled to instructions directing the attention of the jury to the question of intent,[43] or where there is evidence from which the jury might infer that the taking was not fraudulent defendant has a right to have the jury instructed as to the distinction between trespass and larceny.[44]

taking;[45] but the jury may infer from all the facts and circumstances of the case that the felonious intent existed in the first taking.[46] Where the evidence raises only the issue as to what intent defendant had when he received the property, it is not an erroneous instruction to limit the jury to the belief of the accused.[47] It is error to instruct, where defendant received the property innocently, that if he received the property fraudulently he should be convicted.[48]

(III) Intent to Take For a Temporary Use or Purpose. The jury should be instructed that if the accused took the property with intent not to deprive the owner of it, but to use it temporarily, he has not the felonious intent necessary to constitute larceny, whenever it may be inferred from the evidence that defendant intended only a temporary use.[49] But where there is no evidence that defendant intended a temporary use such instruction is not necessary,[50] and a request for a special instruction may be refused where the subject-matter is covered by the general charge.[51]

(IV) Taking Under a Claim of Right. Where there is evidence which has a tendency to show that defendant took the property under a claim of right, the jury should be instructed that if they find that the accused took the property believing he had a right to it,[52] if he took it believing it to be his own,[53] or if he took it under a bona fide mistake as to his authority it is their duty to acquit the accused.[54]

3. Instructions as to Evidence — a. Circumstantial Evidence.[55] Where the evidence is entirely circumstantial the court should instruct that in order to convict the circumstances must be so strong as to exclude every reasonable hypothesis except defendant's guilt.[56] Defendant is entitled to an instruction on circumstantial evidence where the state relies solely on recent unexplained possession,[57] where the place of finding the property is relied on as a circumstance of guilt,[58] or where the case rests merely upon circumstances.[59] So the court may charge that flight and attempted concealment are circumstances to be considered against defendant;[60] but where there is direct evidence of the commission of the offense, a charge on circumstantial evidence is not required.[61]

b. Assumption of Facts.[62] An instruction which assumes any fact or inference which is matter for the jury is erroneous. It has been so held in respect of an assumption that defendant took the property,[63] or had possession of other stolen

(Tex. Cr. App. 1896) 37 S. W. 323; Miles v. State, 1 Tex. App. 510.

What instruction sufficient.— On a trial for theft, a charge that by "fraudulent taking" is meant that the person taking knew at the time that the property was not his own, and that to warrant a conviction the jury must believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the goods taken were the property of the prosecuting witness, sufficiently informs the jury that, if they had a reasonable doubt of the fact that defendant raised or owned the goods taken, they should acquit. Spencer v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. 65, 29 S. W. 159. A charge that, before there could be a conviction for theft of a calf, the jury must believe that it was the property of Y, renders unnecessary an affirmative charge to acquit if they believed that it was the property of defendant, as testified by him. What instructions proper or sufficient.— The court having charged that, if defendant took the steer mistakenly believing it to belong to a brand purchased by him, he was innocent, it was error to add that the transfer must have been a bona fide transfer of the animal he was charged with stealing, since there may have been a mistake which should lead to acquittal, although there was no actual transfer of a particular animal. Lockwood v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1894) 26 S. W. 200. When defendant and others were caught in the act of killing a hog belonging to the prosecutor, defendant's brother explained that they thought the hog was their father's. In the trial of defendant for stealing the hog he adopted that as his theory of defense. A charge that might be construed so as to restrict the explanations made at the time to what was said by defendant was not error, where the jury were also told that, if the defendant believed he was killing his father's hog, he should be acquitted. Poteet v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1897) 43 S. W. 339. Where defendant on trial for theft of cattle claimed that he believed the person for whom he worked, and under whose orders he took the cattle, was the owner of them, an instruction that the jury should acquit him if the person for whom he worked believed that he had authority to take the cattle is sufficiently favorable for him. property,[64] or in respect of inference of asportation,[65] unless the matter assumed was favorable to defendant,[66] or unless the jury might find defendant guilty on the evidence independent of the assumed fact.[67]

c. Evidence of Alibi.[68] Where evidence tending to establish an alibi has been given, a charge on that defense must be given.[69] The charge must not relieve the prosecution of the burden of proof.[70]

d. Evidence of Possession — (i) Form and Requisites in General. It is sufficient to instruct the jury that the unexplained possession of property recently stolen is presumptive evidence that the possessor stole it,[71] and that if the jury have a reasonable doubt as to the truth of the explanation they should acquit.[72] It is not necessary to instruct "if defendant gave an honest account," as honest implies true;[73] but to instruct that the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant had in his possession the identical money stolen before they can convict is error.[74] In instructing on the rule of recent possession it is not necessary to make a direct application of the rule to the facts;[75] or, where the charge is full on the circumstantial evidence, it is not necessary to give a special charge on the recent possession;[76] or if the charge uses the word "lost" instead of "stolen," it is not erroneous.[77]

(ii) Instructions on Weight of Evidence.[78] An instruction on the weight of the possession of the stolen property by defendant as evidence is erroneous.[79]

dence of recent possession it is error to refuse to charge on the effect of such possession.[80] Where there is other evidence an instruction that recent possession was the only inculpatory evidence was properly refused;[81] but where there is no evidence of recent possession no charge need be made.[82] Nor need a charge be made where there is no evidence accounting for the possession,[83] or where the failure to charge does not harm defendant[84] or mislead the jury.[85]

(iv) Applicability to Issues and Evidence.[86] In instructing on recent possession it is error to ignore the defense; the instruction must be made applicable to the facts of the case;[87] although an instruction that the jury should consider the character of the accused when there was no evidence as to his character was held not erroneous.[88] It is error to instruct that recent possession may be considered in establishing the guilt or innocence of defendant, for the jury do not pass on innocence.[89] An instruction on recent possession is not rendered bad by omission to charge that such possession must be exclusive.[90]

(v) Explanation of Possession. Where there is evidence that the accused made an explanation of his possession the jury should be instructed on the explanation of recently stolen property.[91] Where there is no evidence of an explanation no charge need be given,[92] nor need one be given where the court consider the testimony given as no explanation,[93] where no explanation is given until the next day,[94] or where the explanation is inculpatory.[95] It is error to instruct on the explanation of recent possession where the identical property stolen is not found in defendant's possession.[96] Where defendant's explanation is that he purchased the property it is sufficient to charge on the purchase, without charging in regard to the explanation made by defendant.[97] It is a sufficient charge on the explanation of recent possession to charge that if the jury believe that defendant came honestly into possession they should acquit.[98] To authorize conviction if defendant's explanation is false is error,[99] or to charge that his possession is a circumstance against him when his explanation is reasonable is error,[1] unless his explanation of his receiving possession does not exclude the idea of his having had a previous felonious connection with the taking.[2] The court should not suggest what particular explanation was referred to.[3]

(VI) Recent Possession. The jury should be explicitly instructed that unless they find that the possession was recent they should not presume defendant guilty.[4] The fact that defendant was not in possession at the time he made his explanation to the officers does not render an instruction inapplicable.[5] It is error to charge on recent possession before charging on the question of actual larceny.[6]

e. Conduct of Defendant. When the facts warrant it, an instruction that defendant's conduct after the disappearance of the property may be considered as a circumstance of guilt is not erroneous.[7]

court should explain both degrees of the offense and submit the issue to the jury,[8] or leave it to the jury to find the value.[9] There is no need of an instruction as to a grade of the offense when there is no evidence that such a grade was committed.[10] Where there is no proof of value above the amount required for grand larceny there is no need of an instruction except as to petit larceny.[11] On the other hand, where the undisputed testimony places the value above that required for grand larceny, an instruction on petit larceny is not required.[12] Where an aggravated larceny is the same offense whatever the value of the property stolen, no instruction on value need be given.[13] But where the grade of the offense or the sentence depends upon the value of the goods, the jury should be instructed to find the value.[14] Where the jury are instructed to find the value it is not necessary to charge as to grades of the offense.[15] The jury should be instructed to find the market value, not the value to the owner;[16] but in the absence of exception by defendant a charge is sufficient which speaks merely of the value of the property.[17]

b. Parties. On the trial of one indicted as principal in a theft, if the evidence shows that another person was concerned in it, a charge upon the legal position of parties to a crime is necessary. Thus where there is evidence that defendant acted through an innocent agent, the position of one who acts through an innocent agent must be explained to the jury.[18] Where defendant was an accomplice, the jury must be instructed that he can be convicted as principal only if he was present aiding and abetting the taking.[19] When testimony is given by an accom-

Therefore an instruction that, to convict, the evidence must show beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant was an original taker of the animal in the county in which the prosecution took place, and not an accomplice or a receiver of stolen property, was plice, an instruction should be given on the law relating to accomplice testimony.[20] And if there is anything in the evidence tending to show the witness an accomplice, the jury should be instructed that if they find him to have been an accomplice they shall convict on his uncorroborated testimony.[21]

e. Burden of Proof. The burden of proof is on the prosecution to prove that the taking was felonious,[22] and that the goods in the possession of defendant were the identical goods alleged to have been stolen,[23] and the jury should be instructed that this must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.[24] It is a sufficient charge on reasonable doubt to state that it must be a doubt growing out of all the circumstances in the case.[25] It is error to instruct the jury that they must believe defendants beyond a reasonable doubt.[26] Where the evidence is circumstantial it is not sufficient to instruct that the jury should be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt.[27] An instruction which has the effect of invoking against defendant the commission of another offense or that instructs for conviction when the facts are such that defendant may have been guilty of another crime is erroneous.[28]

d. Punishment. If the punishment is not to be fixed by the jury, the court should not inform them as to the amount of punishment imposed.[29] In a state where the jury fixes the penalty, the law as to the permissible punishment should be stated to the jury. A charge stating the penalty for a different offense is erroneous, although the amount is less than that for the offense for which defendant is on trial.[30] If the minimum penalty is rightly stated, but the maximum is stated too large, it is not reversible error where the jury inflict the minimum penalty only.[31] But if the whole penalty is wrongly stated it is erroneous, although the punishment actually imposed comes within the legal maximum.[32] Where the charge states the penalty twice, once correctly, and the other, "not less than two nor more than two nor more than five years," it is not such a misstatement of the penalty as requires a reversal of the judgment.[33] Where the amount of punishment is affected by a voluntary return of the goods an instruction on the effect of a return must be given when the evidence shows that a return has been made.[34] But an instruction is not necessary when the return made does not satisfy the law.[35] improperly refused. Steed v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. 567, 67 S. W. 328. On a trial under an indictment for larceny of a cow, where there is evidence tending to show a conspiracy between defendant and another person to steal and dispose of the cow, a charge which ignores this tendency of the evidence and predicates defendant's right of acquittal upon the fact that the cow was taken and disposed of by such other person is erroneous and properly refused. C. Verdict[36] — 1. Conformity to Indictment. The verdict must be conformable to the indictment.[37]

2. Certainty of Verdict. The verdict of the jury must be reasonably certain in order to support a judgment.[38] Bad spelling and grammar do not vitiate a verdict, so long as the meaning is clear.[39] The charge of the court, defining the grades of the offense and stating to them limits of the punishment, may be used in construing the verdict.[40]

3. General Verdict on Two Counts. If a general verdict of guilty is rendered on an indictment containing two counts, and one count is bad, the verdict may be supported by the good count.[41] But where one is a felony and the other a misdemeanor, and the punishments are different, a general verdict cannot be supported.[42] Under an indictment containing two counts, one for grand larceny and the other for receiving stolen goods, a verdict assessing the value of the property at a sum which reduces the grand larceny to petit larceny, and finding defendant guilty generally on both counts, is inconsistent and void.[43]

4. Indictment For Taking Several Articles. On an indictment for taking several things a general verdict is usually sufficient.[44] It, however, amounts to an

37. State v. McGee, 181 Mo. 312, 80 S. W. 899.

Verdicts held insufficient.— Thus a verdict "guilty of theft of property of the value of twelve dollars" is not a good verdict on an indictment for hog stealing. Collins v. State, 6 Tex. App. 647. And on an indictment for larceny of property worth ten dollars in the commission of burglary a verdict not guilty of burglary but guilty of larceny is not good, although larceny in the commission of burglary is grand larceny. State v. Brown, 73 Mo. 631.

Verdicts held sufficient.— But where, under an indictment for larceny, in which defendant was charged among other things with taking certain promissory notes for the payment of money, commonly called bank-notes, the jury returned a verdict as follows: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of larceny, in taking the money in the indictment mentioned, and fix the amount and value of the same at $127.80," the verdict was sufficiently formal. State v. Bond, 8 Iowa 540. Where, on a trial for the larceny of a bank-note, the ownership of which is laid in C, "agent of the Farmers' Exchange," there is no exception that the evidence fails to show a special property in C, a verdict of guilty establishes C's ownership, and on appeal the words, "agent of the Farmers' Exchange," will be treated as surplusage. State v. Carter, 113 N. C. 639, 18 S. E. 517. On a prosecution under Rev. St. (1899) § 1900, for larceny from the person in the nighttime, a verdict that the jury "find defendant guilty of larceny from the person in the night-time, as charged in the information, and assess the punishment at imprisonment in the penitentiary for five years," is in proper form. State v. Smith, 190 Mo. 706, 90 S. W. 440.

38. Verdicts held sufficient.— Where an information charged larceny from the person of S in the night-time, a verdict, "We, the jury . . find the defendant guilty of larceny from the person in the nighttime as charged," etc., was sufficient. State v. McGee, 188 Mo. 401, 87 S. W. 452. And on an indictment for stealing from the person, a verdict of guilty, as charged, of grand larceny, in stealing from the person, was sufficient. Fallon v. People, 2 Abb. Dec. (N. Y.) 83, 2 Keyes 145 [affirming 6 Park Cr. 256]. In a prosecution for stealing hogs, under a statute, provided that if any person shall steal any sheep, hog, or goat, where the value of the property is under twenty dollars, he shall be punished, a verdict that "the jury find the defendant guilty of theft of property of value of less than $20" is sufficiently definite and certain. Lawrence v. State, 20 Tex. App. 536.

Verdicts held insufficient.— A verdict finding defendant guilty of "fraudulently taking the coal described in the indictment," having found some but not all the elements of larceny, is insufficient. Johnston v. State, 25 Tex. App. 731, 9 S. W. 48. So, a verdict of "guilty of larceny," finding the value of the property "taken from the person of Peter Coleman," sustains a judgment for simple larceny, but not for stealing from the person. indictment for taking each of the articles specified.[45] And therefore where the number of articles taken is important, on account of a separate penalty imposed, the verdict should specify the articles stolen unless all were proved to have been taken;[46] and their value, separately or collectively, should also be specified.[47] Upon an indictment for stealing bank-bills and a gold coin, the jury returned this verdict: "Guilty, but not of taking the gold piece." The court might, against the objection of defendant, record this verdict as a verdict of not guilty as to so much of the indictment as related to the stealing of the gold coin and guilty as to the residue.[48]

5. Grade or Degree of Crime. The verdict must find the grade or degree of the offense. Where a jury on an indictment for grand larceny finds a verdict "guilty as charged" it is a good conviction of grand larceny.[49] And so on an indictment for larceny in a dwelling-house of a verdict "guilty as charged."[50] An imperfect verdict is good if the meaning is clear.[51] The jury may find a defendant guilty of petit larceny, although the goods exceed the value of twelve pence.[52] But where two were indicted for grand larceny, and the proof against both was the same, the jury could not convict one of grand larceny and the other of petit larceny.[53]

6. Value. While the value of the goods taken determines the grade of the offense, and the value must be alleged in an indictment for grand larceny and proved in order to convict, it is usually held unnecessary for the jury in its verdict to find the value; a general verdict of guilty being a finding that the goods taken were of the value alleged.[54] But in Nebraska, where it is specially required by statute that the value should be found, a verdict is held bad which does not find the value;[55] and in New Hampshire the value must be found, as a basis for a Judgment will not be arrested on an indictment for larceny of "sundry bank bills, of the aggregate value of $367," merely because the verdict was "guilty of stealing sundry bank bills, of the value of $317," and "not guilty as to the residue." Com. v. Duffy, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 145.

51. Thus where larceny is divided into grand larceny and petit larceny, a verdict of "guilty of larceny in the second degree" is justified, as standing for petit larceny. People v. Righetti, 66 Cal. 184, 4 Pac. 1063, 1185. And where an information charges petit larceny, but charges no prior conviction, the verdict of "guilty of grand larceny, as charged in the information" will be construed in connection with the information, and taken to mean guilty of petit larceny, and an error of the court in instructing for grand larceny is harmless. Evans v. State, 150 Ind. 651, 50 N. E. 820. judgment for forfeiture of the value.[56] In a few other states it is held that a verdict not finding the value is bad.[57] On an indictment for aggravated larceny where the grade and punishment do not depend on the value of the property taken, the verdict need not assess the value.[58] When the value must be found it is enough to find the aggregate value.[59]

7. Assessment of Punishment. In some jurisdictions the jury may or must assess the punishment. If they may or not as they choose, failure to assess punishment will not invalidate the verdict.[60] An informality in the form of verdict will not be fatal to it.[61] But a verdict assessing a punishment not warranted by law is bad.[62]

D. Sentence.[63] The sentence is sufficient, if it is reasonably certain, although it is in some degree informal. Thus a sentence of imprisonment for a certain term and enough longer to pay the costs at forty cents per day is good, although the costs are to be taxed later by the clerk.[64] So a sentence may omit any provision for restoration of the goods or payment of value to the owner, which is not properly part of the sentence.[65] If hard labor is not part of the punishment, a sentence is not void because the court orders imprisonment at hard labor, since the words may be stricken out.[66] But a sentence of imprisonment for a term longer than legally permitted is void.[67] A sentence is not void, although given on a verdict which might have been set aside on appeal.[68]

XVI. PUNISHMENT.[69]

A. Punishment Must Be on the Indictment and Verdict. The punishment must be for the crime charged in the indictment.[70] In a few cases, where a special punishment is provided, not for a distinct crime but for the general crime committed under special circumstances, the circumstances may be shown after verdict, and need not be charged in the indictment.[71] This is sometimes the case with special punishments for habitual thieves.[72] Punishments for a second offense require an allegation of the former conviction in the indictment.[73] The punishment must also be based on the verdict or plea.[74]

B. The Nature and Amount of Punishment. At common law the amount of punishment is determined by the court, if it is not absolutely fixed by the law;[75] but under statutes it is sometimes fixed by the jury.[76] The amount of punishment may be fixed without regard to the punishment which has been inflicted upon an accomplice in the same offense.[77] Punishment cannot be less than the minimum fixed by law.[78] Matters in mitigation of punishment should be shown by defendant.[79] The punishment must not be excessive,[80] and the law must be complied with as regards the nature of the punishment.[81]

LASCIVIOUSLY. In a lascivious manner, loosely, wantonly, lewdly.[8] (See Lascivious.)

LAST.[9] As an adjective, that which comes or remains after all the others;

figurative expression, . . . does not signify the place of abode. The words are 'in eodem loco ubi quis larem constituit,' i. e. a man has his domicile in that place where he has established his 'larem.' The word must mean, not the place of residence, but the body which resides there; or perhaps more correctly, the act of co-residence as members of the same family."

Latin is an important language in the law; being the language not only of the civil and canon law, but of the early European codes, of much of the ancient common law of England and Scotland, and of a large proportion of the public, civil and maritime law of later times. Burrill L. Dict.

Law Latin is a technical law language made up of Latin and latinized English and French. English L. Dict.

There are three sorts of law Latin: (1) Good Latin, allowed by the grammarians and lawyers; (2) false or incongruous Latin, which in times past would abate original writs, though it would not make void any judicial writ, declaration, or plea, etc.; (3) words of art, known only to the sages of the law, and not to grammarians, called "Lawyers' Latin." "Legal memory" was in England, under the statute of limitation of 32 Hen. VIII, sixty years. In Massachusetts the time of legal memory is analogous to the time prescribed for bringing a writ of right. In New York previous to 1830 it was twenty-five years, and subsequent to that time it was twenty years. Miller v. Garlock, 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 153, 154.

A common-law writ.—"It is a great mistake to say that a levari facias is not a common-law writ. It was in common use before the writ of fieri facias was adopted. Under the feudal system the land of a feudatory could not be sold for the payment of debts; it could only be seized by the sheriff, and held to enforce payment; even goods could not be sold on that form of writ, which was in the nature of a distress, but the fieri facias was resorted to as a means of selling the goods, not the land. At an after-time the writ of elegit was devised as a means of selling one-half of the land. In Hart v. Homiller, 23 Pa. St. 39, see p. 43, it is said to be a common mode of enforcing the payment of specific liens in the Orphans' Court." Stewart v. Miller, 2 Pearson (Pa.) 358, 359.

by which to sell land;[49] the ordinary writ for collecting charges upon land, as in the cases of mortgages, mechanics' liens, and municipal charges.[50] (See CAPIAS AD SATISFACIENDUM; FIERI FACIAS; and, generally, EXECUTIONS.)

LEVARI FACIAS DAMNA DE DISSEISITORIBUS. A writ formerly directed to the sheriff for the levying of damages, which a disseisor had been condemned to pay to the disseisee.[51]

LEVARI FACIAS QUANDO VICECOMES RETURNAVIT QUOD NON HABUIT EMPTORES. An old writ commanding the sheriff to sell the goods of a debtor which he had already taken, and had returned that he could not sell them; and as much more of the debtor's goods as would satisfy the whole debt.[52]

LEVARI FACIAS RESIDUUM DEBITI. An old writ directed to the sheriff for levying the remnant of a partly satisfied debt upon the lands and tenements or chattels of the debtor.[53]

"In England, the taking out of a capias ad satisfaciendum is considered to be an election to have the body, instead of the goods or lands; but his election is made by the creditor himself. Our writ of execution comprehending the capias fieri facias, and levari facias, the taking it out is in no degree indicative of the manner in which it is to be served." Lyman v. Lyman, 11 Mass. 317, 320. "By our statute, we have but one form of an execution, which includes a capias ad satisfaciendum, a levari facias as to the money of the debtor, and an extendi facias as to his lands." Ladd v. Blunt, 4 Mass. 402, 403.

50. "It is the proper process in equity. . . It is a well known form of writ, which even inexperienced clerks can issue without blundering; it requires no special order of the Court to obtain it, and it therefore accords best with the decree, for that gives the plaintiff a right to his money. Ubi est eadem ratio, ibi debet esse idem jus." Hart v. Homiller, 23 Pa. St. 39, 43.

In Pennsylvania it "is the only execution proper on a judgment on a mechanic's lien." The court observed, "that by the statute of the state a mechanic's lien could only be enforced by levari facias,—a writ peculiar to the state of Pennsylvania,—and such a writ could not by law issue against a public body." I. DEFINITION.

A levee is an embankment on the margin of a river or other body of water to prevent inundation.[1]

II. CONSTRUCTION AND MAINTENANCE.

A. In General. Prior to 1879 the work of constructing and maintaining levees in the United States, and particularly along the Mississippi river, was wholly under the care of the several states. At first this duty was imposed Another definition is: "An artificial mound of earth intended exclusively as a protection from overflow." State v. New Orleans, etc., R. Co., 42 La. Ann. 138, 142, 7 So. 226.

A secondary meaning, growing out of the purposes for which levees are commonly used, is "a landing place or quay" (Coffin v. Portland, 27 Fed. 412), "a place . . . for lading and unlading goods" (St. Paul v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 63 Minn. 330, 351, 63 N. W. 267, 65 N. W. 649, 68 N. W. 458, 34 L. R. A. 184; McAlpine v. Chicago Great Western R. Co., 68 Kan. 207, 75 Pac. 73, 64 L. R. A. 85).

Distinguished from: "Embankment" see Dehon v. Lafourché Basin Levee Bd., 110 La. 767, 34 So. 770; State v. New Orleans, etc., R. Co., 42 La. Ann. 138, 7 So. 226. "Street." see St. Paul v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 63 Minn.

almost exclusively upon riparian landowners, each being required to construct and maintain the levees on his own land; but after the Civil war, because of the great changes wrought in the lower Mississippi valley by the devastation of the country and the emancipation of the slave labor, the landowners were relieved of this burdensome duty and it was imposed upon the state and its local political divisions.[2] Since 1879 the Federal government, under its authority over foreign and interstate commerce, has coöperated with the states in the construction and maintenance of these important public works.[3]

B. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions. The right of the state to construct and maintain levees, whether by direct action or through subordinate political divisions, is comprehended under the police power.[4]

C. Proceedings For Establishment. In some jurisdictions the construction of levees is undertaken by the state or local authorities on their own initiative;[5] in others, their establishment can only be undertaken upon the initiative of the persons to be affected, usually by petition.[6] Since, however, the construction of

The power and its limitations.— "The building of levees in Louisiana is a public enterprise or work which concerns directly at least half the people of the State, and incidentally the whole State. Of the propriety of constructing levees, the General Assembly is the exclusive judge, because we find in the constitution no limitation upon the right of the people, through the General Assembly, to exercise the power." State v. Maginnis, 26 La. Ann. 558, 559. But the state has no such power where the constitution forbids it to "contract any debt for works of internal improvement, or be a party in carrying on such works." State v. Froelich, 115 Wis. 32, 95 Am. St. Rep. 894, 58 L. R. A. 757. A constitutional and statutory provision "permitting the owners or occupants of lands to construct drains and ditches for agricultural and sanitary purposes across the lands of others" does not authorize the construction of a levee along a river, as an independent work, not connected with a system of drainage of lands for agricultural or sanitary purposes. Updike v. Wright, 81 Ill. 49. But the constitution of Illinois has been amended since the decision in Updike v. Wright, so as to allow the construction of a levee such as was therein declared unconstitutional. Lovell v. Sny Island Levee Drainage Dist., 159 Ill. 188, 42 N. E. 600; O'Brien v. Wheelock, 95 Fed. 883, 37 C. C. A. 309 [affirmed in 184 U. S. 450, 22 S. Ct. 354, 46 L. ed. 636]. Under a constitutional provision forbidding any appropriation of money for a longer term than two years, money appropriated for the construction of a levee cannot be applied after the expiration of two years. Robertson v. Caldwell, 14 La. Ann. 864.

Validity of statutes.— An act entitled "An act to provide for the construction, reparation and protection of drains, ditches and levees across the lands of others, for agricultural, sanitary and mining purposes, and to provide for the organization of drainage districts" is not unconstitutional because embracing more than one subject, since the subject of the act is the protection of the land against surplus water. Blake v. People, 109 Ill. 504. And see Dehon v. Lafourché Basin Levee Bd., 110 La. 767, 34 So. 770. A statute requiring owners of an embankment along a river to repair the same upon notice to do so, and allowing repairs to be made at their expense upon their failure to make them is unconstitutional because providing no judicial method of determining the necessity of the repairs. Philadelphia v. Scott, 81 Pa. St. 80, 22 Am. Rep. 738.

5. Lamb v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 73 Cal. 125, 14 Pac. 625, 2 Am. St. Rep. 775; Egan v. Hart, 45 La. Ann. 1358, 14 So. 244; State v. Maginnis, 26 La. Ann. 558; Jefferson Parish Police Jury v. Tardos, 22 La. Ann. 58.

such public works involves the taking of private property, the expenditure of large sums of money, and frequently the levying of levee taxes and assessments, all statutes must be strictly complied with or the proceedings will be void.[7]

D. Land on Which Levee May Be Constructed — 1. Nature of Authority to Take. Land taken by the state for the purpose of the construction of a levee is usually taken under the power of eminent domain;[8] but in at least one jurisdiction it is taken under the exercise, by the state, of its police power.[9]

2. Compensation. When taken under the power of eminent domain, under the constitutional provisions requiring compensation for private property taken for public purposes, the owner is entitled to compensation,[10] but when taken under the exercise of the police power, no compensation is made to the owner.[11]

3. Doctrine of Servitude in Louisiana.[12] By a doctrine of the civil law in force in Louisiana before its purchase by the United States, and still the law of Louisiana, lands abutting on navigable rivers and bayous are held by their owners subject to a servitude in favor of the public, whereby such portions thereof as are necessary for the purpose of making and repairing public levees may be taken, in pursuance of law, without compensation, the injury to the property being damnum absque injuria. Laws and regulations providing for the taking of such lands are not unconstitutional because in violation of the state constitution providing that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public purposes without just and adequate compensation being first paid,"[13] nor of the section of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States which provides "nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."[14]

4. Power Strictly Construed.[15] A statute authorizing the taking of land in

The authorization of a levee also authorizes such work as is "strictly needful" for its proper construction. Dehon v. Lafourché Basin Levee Bd., 110 La. 767, 34 So. 770.

Under the Illinois statute, which authorizes drainage commissioners to use district funds for the construction or repair of ditches and levees within or without the district, it is not essential that the petition asking for an assessment to repair a levee should specify where the desired work is to be done in order to authorize the expenditure of the assessment in repairing the levee at a point outside the district. Even though the destruction of buildings is required.— Hanson v. Lafayette, 18 La. 295.

A landowner does not cease to be a riparian proprietor, nor escape from the servitude, by the condemnation of a strip of his land along the river for a public road or street. Ruch v. New Orleans, 43 La. Ann. 275, 9 So. 473.

But property away from the Mississippi river, owing no servitude for levees, must be paid for when expropriated for a levee. Koerber v. New Orleans Levee Bd., 51 La. Ann. 523, 25 So. 415; Pontchartrain R. Co. v. Orleans Levee Dist. Com'rs, 49 La. Ann. 570, 21 So. 765.

15. No abandonment of a public levee can one county for a levee does not authorize the taking of any land in an adjoining county,[16] although necessary for protection of the district.

E. Contracts For Construction.[17] The conveyance of land in consideration of the construction of a levee constitutes a contract, for the violation of which an action will lie against the parish for damages,[18] but where no time is stipulated for the letting of the contract or erection of the levee a reasonable time is allowed.[19] The fact that private parties have bound themselves to pay additional funds to a contractor to whom the work of construction of a public levee has been awarded does not impair the public character of the work or affect its control by the state.[20]

F. Liability and Lien For Cost of Construction and Maintenance — 1. LIABILITY FOR. There can be no recovery against either a state or its local subdivisions or boards or against individuals for the cost of construction and maintenance of levees, unless the statutes and police regulations have been strictly complied with.[21] Since the riparian proprietors on the Mississippi are not now bound to maintain the levees on their lands, they are not liable to third persons for expenses voluntarily incurred in closing a crevasse on their lands.[22]

2. LIEN FOR — a. When Existing. In Louisiana,[23] prior to their repeal by the statute of Feb. 27, 1866, the statutes imposed the duty of constructing and maintaining levees upon riparian landowners, and upon their failure to execute such work, when notified, it might be done under the direction of the police juries of the parish, and the cost recovered from the delinquent landowners, whose land was subject to a privilege or lien for the amount and might be sold to satisfy it. These statutes were strictly construed, and no lien existed nor was any sale valid, unless their provisions were strictly complied with.[24]

Rescission or cancellation.— A contract by which a railroad company agreed with a Louisiana levee district to build a portion of its railroad in Arkansas, in the form of a levee embankment, in violation of Arkansas statutes, and in opposition to Arkansas levee authorities, is impossible of performance, and should be rescinded. Under La. Acts (1874), No. 4, creating the Louisiana levee company, and providing for the levy of a tax for the creation of a levee construction fund, plaintiff's claim for construction and maintaining levees is a debt against and payable out of the fund thereby created, and is not a charge against the state. In Pennsylvania no duty lies on the owner of flat or cripple lands between high and low water mark, on the bank of a river, to shut out the stream by the construction of a bank or levee; but where the state, under her police power, at her own expense, has banked out the water and left the owner in possession of the land thus protected, the duty to repair the bank falls on him. b. Registration. A privilege or lien on land acquired by repairs to a levee under contract with the owner of the land,[25] or by direction of the police jury,[26] is not superior to the lien of a mortgage on the land, unless registered as provided by law.

G. Injuries From Construction or Maintenance[27] — 1. In General. Under a constitution providing for compensation to the landowner for so much of his property as is "taken, appropriated, or damaged," the landowner is entitled to compensation not only for damages by the original construction of a levee,[28] but also for damages inflicted in its repair.[29] Under such provisions damages may be recovered by a landowner whose land is flooded by a stream dammed up by the levee, although none of his land is actually taken.[30]

2. Defects. Where it is the duty of a riparian proprietor to maintain a levee on his land, he is liable to third parties for damages resulting to them from his failure or neglect to do so.[31] A corporation, however, employed by the state to

Under Miss. Const. § 238, no compensation can be recovered for damages to land "because of its being left outside a levee." Thus he cannot recover damages because such land is left without protection or for the expense of removing buildings from such land, but may recover damages for the obstruction of the drainage of such land by the levee. Ham v. Yazoo-Mississippi Delta Levee Com'rs, 83 Miss. 534, 35 So. 943; Duncan v. Mississippi Levee Com'rs, 74 Miss. 125, 20 So. 838; Richardson v. Levee Com'rs, 68 Miss. 539, 9 So. 351; Yazoo-Mississippi Delta Levee Com'rs v. Harkleroads, 62 Miss. 807. "Damages produced by independent causes, other than being left outside the levee, if in their nature allowable within the rules of law, are still recoverable." Duncan v. Mississippi Levee Com'rs, 74 Miss. 125, 128, 20 So. 838. That all other damage which is not remote, and arises directly from the taking of part for levee purposes, resulting to the owner's adjacent land immediately from the construction of the levee, is to be compensated for, seems as clear as the denial of damage by the river. Richardson v. Levee Com'rs, 68 Miss. 539, 9 So. 351.

It is no defense to an action for damages for improper construction of a levee that the obstruction to drainage complained of occurred many years before, limitations not having been pleaded, nor that plaintiff would have sustained equal damage if the levee had not been constructed at all. Bader v. St. Francis Levee Dist., 110 Mo. App. 599, 85 S. W. 654.

When a municipality, acting under authority of a statute (Spellman v. Caledonia, 117 Wis. 254, 97 N. W. 271), or upon a license given it by the owners of lands along a natural watercourse (Hamilton v. Ashbrook, 62 Ohio St. 511, 57 N. E. 239), constructs levees for the purpose of confining its waters, it does not thereby undertake that the levees are sufficient to protect such lands from over-build levees as directed by a commissioner of engineers and according to a standard fixed by the engineers is not liable for injuries by inundation by crevasses before the appointment of engineers,[32] or where it has not been directed by the engineers to build the levee or had not failed to do the work according to the standard fixed by the engineers.[33]

3. Consequential Damages. Levee or drainage districts are not liable for damages resulting from the erection along a stream of a levee which, by reason of keeping the stream within its banks at the point where erected, causes the stream to overflow other lands situated upon the river.[34] Nor may an action be maintained by a landowner to subject the public funds of such district to the payment of damages resulting to his land from the carelessness, negligence, recklessness, or unscientific work in the construction of a levee by the agents and employees of said board.[35]

4. Damages When Payable. Except in cases of urgent public necessity, land cannot be lawfully taken or damaged in the construction or repair of a levee before condemnation or the payment of damages therefor.[36]

H. Injuries to Levees. The unlawful destruction, cutting, or injury of levees is not only punishable criminally,[37] but also subjects the perpetrator to an action for damages by persons sustaining special injuries.[38]

III. Levee Districts, Boards, Companies, and Officers.

A. Districts — 1. Nature and Creation in General — a. Definition. A levee district is a quasi-public corporation, created by the state, under its police power, for the performance of certain prescribed governmental functions in the district, such as the prevention of the overflowing or inundation of lands.[39] It is simply a flow, nor does it engage to maintain them. Otherwise, where injury results from defective construction. Barden v. Portage, 79 Wis. 126, 48 N. W. 210.

governmental agency, of the same nature as a county taxing district, or school-district, for the performance of certain governmental functions.[40]

b. How Created. Such a district can be created not only by the means and in the manner provided by the general law, but also by special act,[41] or by implication of law, as by legislative recognition subsequent to its organization,[42] and it is not necessary that the statute expressly declare it a corporation.[43]

c. How Validity Attacked. When organized under the forms of law, it becomes at least a corporation de facto and the validity of the proceedings leading up to its creation and organization is not subject to collateral attack,[44] and may be questioned only by a proceeding in the name of the state,[45] such as a writ

Nature of such districts.— The term "quasi-corporation" applies to a body which exercises certain functions of a corporate character, but has not been created a corporation by any statute. Carson v. St. Francis Levee Dist., 59 Ark. 513, 27 S. W. 590. People v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 53 Cal. 346, 348. "If these districts can be said to be corporations at all, I think they are properly called public corporations for municipal purposes. of quo warranto,[46] scire facias,[47] or certiorari.[48] But a levee district organized under an unconstitutional law is not even a corporation de facto, and its existence may be questioned in a collateral proceeding.[49]

2. Proceedings For Organization. In some jurisdictions levee districts are created directly by the legislature;[50] but more frequently authority is conferred upon the county courts,[51] boards of supervisors,[52] or other local authorities to organize such districts upon petition of landowners within the proposed district.[53]

3. Territory Included.[54] The same territory cannot legally be made part of two levee districts.[55] Under a statute authorizing the construction of a levee in one county,[56] no power is granted to extend a portion of the levee into an adjoining county.[57]

B. Boards, Commissioners, Etc. — 1. In General. The governing power of levee districts is usually vested in boards of commissioners.[58] Since the levee district is a political subdivision of the state, the levee commissioners are public officers endowed with a corporate being only for the purpose of the public trust confided to them.[59]

2. Powers. Such boards, from the very nature of their duties in protecting

In California, by St. (1891) p. 30, petition must be signed by a majority of the landowners within the proposed district. De Baker v. Batcheller, 97 Cal. 472, 32 Pac. 512. When organization is based on a petition, it must conform strictly to the statutory requirements. Brandenstein v. Hoke, 101 Cal. 131, 35 Pac. 562. A statute which directs that on the presentation of a petition, the board of supervisors "shall at once proceed" to erect a levee district, without giving them any discretion to reject the petition, change the boundaries of the district, or otherwise exercise any discretion, is unconstitutional as an improper delegation of legislative powers to interested individuals. Brandenstein v. Hoke, 101 Cal. 131, 35 Pac. 562; Moulton v. Parks, 64 Cal. 166, 30 Pac. 613.

Illinois act of May 29, 1879, requiring a petition for the formation of a drainage district to be presented to the county court, and the finding of certain facts as a prerequisite to its creation as a corporation, is not invalid as authorizing the county court to create the corporation, since it is the statute itself, and not the court, which brings into existence the corporation. Blake v. People, 109 Ill. 504.

The territory to be included within the district should be carefully described in the statute or petition upon which the organization of the district is based. De Baker v. Batcheller, 97 Cal. 472, 32 Pac. 512. But where the petition is required to be published, it is not necessary that a plot referred to in the petition be also published. De Baker v. Batcheller, 97 Cal. 472, 32 Pac. 512. What territory included see infra, III, A, 3.

54. Islands bounded on one side by the Gulf of Mexico proper, and surrounded by its waters, must be held to lie "in" the gulf, and not included in the levee district described as "between the Bayou La Fourche, the Mississippi river and the Gulf of Mexico," although an island surrounded by inland waters is not necessarily outside a levee district. A levee board when superseded in its functions by a law dividing the district and creating a new corporation for one portion, and placing the other under charge of the local authorities, ceases to exist, except so far as its existence is expressly continued for special objects, such as settling up its indebtedness, etc. Barkley v. Levee Com'rs, 93 U. S. 258, 23 L. ed. 893.

A trustee of a reclamation district is disqualified from acting with respect to the acquisition by the district of a levee owned by himself. Reclamation Dist. v. Turner, 104 Cal. 334, 37 Pac. 1038.

their respective districts against sudden inundations,[60] are vested with plenary power and large discretion in the location, erection, and repair of levees.[61] They may accordingly determine the amount of land needful in constructing or repairing levees,[62] may abandon a levee and build one in another place, or otherwise change the line of the levee.[63]

3. Control by Courts. The courts will not control the action of such boards on the ground alone that they have acted hastily or unwisely.[64] But in cases of gross or arbitrary abuse of their powers they may be restrained by the courts.[65]

4. Contracts. A contract by a levee board of one state for the construction of a levee in another state without the coöperation of the authorities of the latter is ultra vires and void.[66] Nor has a levee board any power to donate to a private corporation land granted to it for the purpose of enabling it to establish a levee system.[67]

5. Personal Liability. In case of wanton or gross abuse of their powers by levee commissioners resulting in damage to individuals, they are personally liable for such damages upon suit by the parties injured.[68]

C. Police Juries. The legislature may constitutionally delegate to police juries or other local authorities power to pass such ordinances as they may deem necessary in regard to levees,[69] as for their protection and preservation.[70]

D. Companies. It is within the power of the legislature to create a levee company and to invest it with the necessary authority to construct levees.[71]

E. Funds—1. How Obtained. Statutes creating levee districts also provide

60. "The very nature of the ever shifting yet ever present danger of ruin by flood, against which the levees are designed to guard, renders it imperative that the board should have the fullest latitude in dealing with each situation as it may arise and confront them." for the creation of funds to pay their obligations, either by the levying of taxes or assessments,[72] or by the sale of bonds.[73]

2. When Bonds Void.[74] If the statute is unconstitutional,[75] or if the bonds or other certificates of indebtedness are not issued strictly in accordance therewith,[76] they are void.

3. How Funds Applied. The funds thus created are held by the commissioner or other officers in trust,[77] for the purposes expressed in the statute. Taxes received and lands forfeited may not be diverted by subsequent act of the legislature,[78] nor to the payment of damages caused by the negligent or other wrongful conduct of the commissioners.[79]

Bonds of levee district are not void since neither the district nor the board of directors thereof is a "municipality" under a provision of the constitution prohibiting a county, city, town, or municipality from issuing any interest-bearing evidences of debt, except to pay an existing indebtedness. Memphis Trust Co. v. St. Francis Levee Dist., 69 Ark. 284, 62 S. W. 902.

Where bonds are issued under a statute providing that certain taxes shall constitute a fund for their payment, a subsequent statute relieving a portion of the land from the taxes is unconstitutional as violating the obligation of a contract. Repeal of law creating district.— Where taxes are collected for the benefit of a levee district, and the laws creating the district are repealed, without the taxes having been expended, they constitute a trust fund in the hands of a board of levee and drainage commissioners subsequently created for the same district for the purposes for which the district was recreated. F. Actions — 1. Right to Sue or Be Sued. The capacity of levee boards, commissioners, and companies to sue and be sued is governed by statute.[82]

2. Parties.[83] Who are proper parties in such actions is dependent on the statutes.[84]

3. Jurisdiction. Jurisdiction to administer the trust funds of levee districts for the benefit of the bondholders is vested in the courts of equity.[85] A levee district board engaged only in the exercise of public duties and functions, although authorized to sue and to be sued, has a local situs, and cannot be sued outside the state of its domicile.[86]

4. Form of Action — a. Ejectment.[87] Under a statute providing that the remedy of a landowner by ad quod damnum proceedings "shall be exclusive of all other remedies," ejectment will not lie against a levee board to recover land taken for levee purposes.[88]

b. Injunction.[89] Injunction is the proper remedy to prevent the payment of warrants alleged to be illegal.[90]

c. Mandamus.[91] Where the duty is imposed by statute on a county court to levy a tax for levee purposes, it may be compelled by mandamus to perform its duty.[92] Wherever discretion is conferred, however, mandamus does not lie.[93]

5. Pleading.[94] In a suit against a levee company for damages caused by a crevasse the petition in order to set forth a prima facie cause of action must allege facts sufficient to constitute a failure or violation on the part of the company of duties imposed by statute.[95]

6. Evidence.[96] In an action for damages, caused by defective construction of a levee, evidence of the amount required to put the levee in proper condition is admissible as to the amount of damages.[97]

Under a statute giving a board of levee commissioners the capacity to sue and be sued and granting them perpetual succession, and under a subsequent statute substituting the auditor and treasurer of the state for the commissioners, the auditor and treasurer can be sued, and the state is a proper party, but in the absence of direct authority to sue the land commissioner, he cannot be sued. State v. Woodruff, 83 Miss. 111, 36 So. 79, 37 So. 706.

A diking district is not a necessary party defendant to a suit by taxpayers to enjoin payment of its warrants, the question at issue being their validity, which depends on the construction of a statute; and the collection and disbursement of the dike taxes being in the hands of the county treasurer, free from control of the district. Abbott v. Gaches, 20 Wash. 517, 56 Pac. 28.

IV. TAXES AND ASSESSMENTS.

A. Taxes — 1. Power of Legislature to Levy. Subject to the provisions of the state and federal constitutions, the legislatures of the several states have full power to levy taxes for the erection and maintenance of levees [98] as public works within the sphere of the police power.[99] This power may be exercised directly by the legislature, by the levy of a tax upon the whole state,[1] or may be delegated by it to local authorities for the levy of taxes within their respective jurisdiction.[2] Under many of the more recent state constitutions, however, the power of the legislature to levy taxes for such purposes is greatly circumscribed,[3] and where the legislature exceeds its constitutional powers the statute is void.[4]

2. Nature of the Tax. A special tax for levee purposes, as distinguished from an assessment,[5] is a charge imposed upon all the subjects within the district included, on which the state imposes a tax for general purposes.[6]

B. Assessments — 1. Their Nature. Local assessments for levee purposes, while levied under the taxing power, in its broadest sense,[7] are not strictly speaking taxes, but are charges upon particular property specially benefited by the levee and are imposed, not as a burden, but in return for the benefits conferred.[8]

For proceedings on appeal to the court as to the amount of the assessment see Lovell v. Sny Island Levee Drainage Dist., 159 Ill. 188, 42 N. E. 600.

98. Carson v. St. Francis Levee Dist., 59 Ark. 513, 27 S. W. 590; McGehee v. Mathis, 21 Ark. 40; Wallace v. Shelton, 14 La. Ann. 498. A statute which authorizes the levee commissioners to levy a tax on the "assessed valuation" of the property does not contemplate a new valuation and assessment. Hollingsworth v. Thompson, 45 La. Ann. 222, 12 So. 1, 40 Am. St. Rep. 220.

Levees are not "an internal improvement and local concern," within the meaning of Ark. Const. art. 6, § 9, providing that the county court shall have jurisdiction in all matters relating to the internal improvements and local concerns of the respective counties, and hence a statute granting to a board of levee inspectors power to adjust the levying and assessment of taxes for levees is not unconstitutional. McGehee v. Mathis, 21 Ark. 40.

99. State v. Clinton, 25 La. Ann. 401; Williams v. Cammack, 27 Miss. 209, 61 Am. Dec. 508.

"The building of levees in Louisiana is a public enterprise or work which concerns directly at least half the people of the State, and incidentally the whole State. Of the propriety of constructing levees, the General Assembly is the exclusive judge, because we find in the constitution no limitation upon the right of the people, through the General Assembly, to exercise the power. They have the right to assess a tax and to expend the money arising therefrom, if they choose, in the construction of levees, or in the erection of such public works as they may deem beneficial." 5. See infra, IV, B, 1.

6. It is essential to its nature as a tax that it be uniform throughout the district, and be levied in proportion to the value of the property upon which it falls, without any attention being paid to the benefits to be conferred. People v. Whyler, 41 Cal. 351; Munson v. Atchafalaya Basin Levee Com'rs, 43 La. Ann. 15, 8 So. 906; Morrison v. Morey, 146 Mo. 543, 48 S. W. 629.

7. Excelsior Planting, etc., Co. v. Green, 39 La. Ann. 455, 1 So. 873; Charnock v. Levee Dist. Co., 38 La. Ann. 323, 325, where it is said: "The exaction of such contributions is an exercise of the taxing power, in its broadest sense. There is nothing in this case to support the assessment as an exercise of the police power or of the power of eminent domain, and unless we are to attribute it to some 'vagrant power,' there is no other source from which it can spring except the power of taxation."

Assessments according to the value of the land, and not according to the amount of benefits received by each parcel, to pay for public improvements in an irrigation district, are not unconstitutional, unless by force of an express constitutional provision, as such assessments are included in the inherent power of taxation, which is not limited to the benefits received. In re Bonds of Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 28 Pac. 272, 65 Am. St. Rep. 106, 14 L. R. A. 755.

Especially are such assessments not considered taxes within the constitutional restrictions on the power of taxation, such as that it must be equal and uniform, or according to the value of property.[9]

2. How Levied. They are levied only on property benefited, and not in proportion to the value of the property, but in proportion to the amount of benefit.[10] The validity of assessments, upon these principles, for levee purposes, has been repeatedly sustained.[11]

3. How District Determined. The assessment district must be determined by the legislature or other public authority, whose discretion in defining the area to be benefited by the proposed levee is not subject to control by the courts.[12]

C. Property Liable — 1. Extent and Nature. The legislature is vested with large discretionary powers as to the nature and extent of the property upon which taxes and assessments may be imposed for levee purposes,[13] and is held to delegate such discretion to local bodies, officers, etc., that are authorized by statute to levy

9. Carson v. St. Francis Levee Dist., 59 Ark. 513, 27 S. W. 590; McGehee v. Mathis, 21 Ark. 40; Munson v. Atchafalaya Basin Levee Dist. Com'rs, 43 La. "That provision of our state constitution, which requires taxation to be proportioned to the value of the property on which it is laid, is only applicable to taxation in its usual, ordinary and received sense, and is, therefore, limited to taxation for general purposes alone, where the money raised by the tax goes into the State treasury, or the county treasury, or the general fund of some city or town, and is applicable to any purpose to which the legislative body of such state, county or town may choose to apply it; and it is not intended to apply to local assessments, where the money raised is to be expended on the property taxed." Right of appeal.— A statutory provision that the decision of the board of levee inspectors on all questions relating to the improper assessment of land "shall be final" does not deprive the landowners of the right of appeal to the courts. McGehee v. Mathis, 21 Ark. 40.

13. George v. Young, 45 La. Ann. 1232, 14 So. 137; Williams v. Cammack, 27 Miss. 209, 61 Am. Dec. 508.

Three elements must concur for validity of such assessments: (1) The work must be public and of a character to confer special local benefits on the district within which the assessment is levied; (2) the assessment must be supported by benefits actually or presumptively received by the persons or property subjected to it; and (3) the contribution must not manifestly exceed the benefit conferred. Where these elements, or any of them, are clearly wanting in contributions exacted under the name of a local or special assessment, the legislative action cannot be sustained. But the province of determining for what objects, in what districts, and on what persons or property such assessments may be levied, is wisely and indeed necessarily confided to the legislative department, and it is only where the assessment is so manifestly unjust, oppressive, and violative of the foregoing requirements as to give demonstration that they have been disregarded that a court will be justified in overruling the legislative judgment. Minor v. Sheriff, 43 La. Ann. 337, 338, 2 So. 49.

All lands in the district must be assessed under a statute providing for an assessment "upon the lands situated within the district." Sacramento County Levee Dist. v. Huber, 57 Cal. 41.

Land injured.— A tax is valid, although the levee injures some land in the district rather than benefits it, and although both the land benefited and that injured are assessed at their original value. People v. Whyler, 41 Cal. 351.

Subsequent inclusion of land in district.— Where land situated in a county where there such taxes and assessments.[14] Taxes may be levied generally on all persons and property subject to taxation for state purposes,[15] or may be levied only on lands within the district.[16] Assessments are usually levied directly and exclusively on the real estate benefited,[17] but may be imposed upon the produce of the land.[18]

2. EXEMPTIONS. Within the discretionary power just mentioned[19] the legislature or the local authorities under authority delegated to them may exempt property from taxation or assessment for levee purposes.[20]

D. Assessment and Collection — 1. HOW METHOD DETERMINED. The method of assessment[21] and collection,[22] including such matters of detail as the officer or officers upon whom such duty is imposed,[23] the time of assessment and collection,[24] was no tax for levees was subsequently included by act of the legislature within the boundaries of another county comprised within a levee district wherein there was a levee tax, such land is subject to tax. Holder v. Bond, (Miss. 1901) 29 So. 769; Smith v. Willis, 78 Miss. 243, 28 So. 878.

14. McDermott v. Mathis, 21 Ark. 60.

This discretion will not be controlled unless it be demonstrated that the contribution exacted is unsupported by any possible benefit, or out of all proportion to such possible benefit. Hill v. Fontenot, 46 La. Ann. 1563, 16 So. 475; Minor v. Sheriff, 43 La. Ann. 337, 9 So. 49.

That the lands are not subject to overflow from the Mississippi river nor protected by levees is not sufficient to justify judicial interference, for, although not themselves subject to overflow, they may receive benefit from improved means of access and transportation, and from the general improvement of the community, by the protection of adjacent lands subject to overflow (Memphis Land, etc., Co. v. St. Francis Levee Dist., 64 Ark. 258, 24 S. the amount,[25] submission to popular vote, and method of voting[26] of levee taxes is wholly determined by statute.[27] It is essential to the validity of the taxes and assessments that the statutes authorizing them be valid,[28] and be complied with.[29] But it will be presumed that all the requirements of the statute have been met,[30] and upon their assessment being shown, the burden of proof is on the party assailing them to prove their illegality.[31]

An invalid assessment of property in a county is not impliedly validated by a subsequent statute imposing a tax for levee purposes. "It is necessary not only to have a proper levy of taxes, but it is essential to have a legal assessment of the lands upon which the levy is to operate. The assessment roll is the warrant of the tax collector for collecting the taxes; if that is void, his action in the sale of land under it is void." Mullins v. Shaw, 77 Miss. 900, 910, 27 So. 602. 28 So. 958.

Under a statute requiring three inspectors to examine and designate land to be assessed, such examination and designation by two of them is not sufficient, although their report is afterward signed by the third. Ballard v. Davis, 31 Miss. 525.

There can be no valid reassessment, in the absence of special legislative authority, where the original assessment is invalid. Franklin Sav. Bank v. Moran, 19 Wash. 200, 52 Pac. 858.

Opinions of witnesses who profess to be familiar with the subject of inquiry, and who have had opportunities of acquiring information on such subject, are competent as to how much land will be benefited or damaged by a levee, even though they do not live in the immediate neighborhood of such land, Lovell v. Sny Island Levee Drainage Dist., 159 Ill. 188, 42 N. E. Sale of Land For Non-Payment — 1. In General. In event of non-payment of taxes for levee purposes the lands upon which they are assessed may be sold,[36] and, if no bid is received for the amount of the taxes, may be purchased by the public authorities[37] in whom the title vests to the same extent as if bought by a private individual.[38]

2. Compliance With Statutory Provisions. It is necessary to the validity of such sale that the statutes under which it is made be constitutional,[39] and that they be strictly complied with in the assessment of lands, levy of taxes, and proceedings for the sale.[40] But slight irregularities will not avoid the sale.[41]

3. Where More Than One Sale. Land once sold to the state or other public authority for delinquent taxes cannot be the subject of a second valid sale[42] until purchased or redeemed, and the purchaser at such a subsequent sale acquires no title.[43]

4. Method of Sale. The legislature possesses large discretion in determining the general method of sale[44] and the details of procedure.[45] It may accordingly authorize such sale to be made either summarily by the tax officials[46] or to be made by the courts at the suit of the levee commissioners.[47]

5. Effect of Deed. A deed from the proper officer to land sold for delinquent taxes is prima facie evidence of title,[48] and it is within the power of the legislature to make such deed conclusive evidence of the fulfilment of all requirements imposed by statute,[49] although it cannot make such deed conclusive evidence of compliance with the fundamental requirements derived from the constitution.[50]

F. Redemption. Provision is usually made by statute that the owner of lands sold for delinquent taxes,[51] whether sold to the state or to a private individual,[52] shall have a certain length of time in which to redeem,[53] upon payment of the purchase-price or taxes due, together with costs of sale and an additional penalty;[54] but in the absence of such a statute no right of redemption exists after the sale.[55] The purchaser is entitled to allowance for improvements on the property made before suit brought to redeem, but not for improvements made after the institution of the suit nor for their rental value.[56]

I. DEFINITION.

Lewd is defined as given to the unlawful indulgence of lust, dissolute, lustful, filthy.[1] Lewdness is an offense against morality by frequenting houses of ill fame, or by some grossly scandalous and public indecency;[2] licentiousness.[3]

II. NATURE AND ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

A. At Common Law. The offense of lewdness at common law was confined to open and public indecency,[4] and was a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment.[5]

B. By Statute — 1. In General. In many jurisdictions the scope of the offense at common law has been enlarged by statute, so as to include illicit sexual intercourse, and the irregular indulgence of lust, whether public or private.[6]

2. Unlawful Cohabitation or Living Together in Adultery or Fornication — a. The Living Together. To convict of the offense of lewdly and lasciviously associating and cohabiting together, there must be a dwelling or living together by the parties as if the conjugal relation existed,[7] and their illicit intercourse

Previous arrangement and understanding.— A single act of criminal intimacy is not sufficient to constitute the offense of living in fornication or adultery, although that act was the result of previous arrangement and understanding between the parties. Smith v. State, 39 Ala. 554.

Same habitation.— "Cohabiting" or "living together" means that the parties must dwell or reside together in the same habitation as a common or joint residing place. Bush v. State, 37 Ark. 215; Lyerly v. State, 36 Ark. 39; Sullivan v. State, 32 Ark. 187; Richardson v. State, 37 Tex. 346; Massey v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1901) 65 S. App. 105, where it is held that repeated adulterous meetings at any given place, or even at different places, may be such a cohabiting as will constitute the offense.

Master and servant.— Where parties live together in the same family and under the same roof, in the relation of master and servant, occasional sexual intercourse will the relation is sufficient, and it is not necessary to establish any agreement or understanding between them that sexual intercourse should continue.[9]

b. Notoriety. Under the statutes of most of the states it is an essential element of the offense of unlawful cohabitation or living in adultery that such relation should be open and notorious.[10] In some states, however, this is not necessary.[11]

3. Lewd and Lascivious Behavior or Carriage. At common law lascivious behavior in the presence of only one person, although in a place of public resort, was not an indictable offense.[12] Under the statutes, however, it has been generally held that this offense may as well be committed in the presence of one person as of many,[13] even where such behavior is required to be "open."[14]

not constitute the offense of living together in unlawful cohabitation. State v. Kirkpatrick, 63 Iowa 554, 19 N. W. 600; State v. Marvin, 12 Iowa 499; Carotti v. State, 42 Miss. 334, 97 Am. Dec. 465; State v. Osborne, 39 Mo. App. 372. However, the mere relationship of master and servant, or mistress and hired man, between the parties, will not necessarily exclude the other relationship of lewd and lascivious cohabitation. State v. Cassida, 67 Kan. 171, 72 Pac. 522.

Cohabitation under belief of marriage.— Cohabitation under an honest, although mistaken, belief that the parties cohabiting are lawfully married, will not support an indictment for lewd and lascivious cohabitation, if not such as to create a common scandal or tend to corrupt the public morals. Com. v. Munson, 127 Mass. 459, 34 Am. Rep. 411. See also Delany v. People, 10 Mich. 241; Schoudel v. State, 57 N. J. L. 209, 30 Atl. 598.

Rep. 357 [distinguishing Com. v. Catlin, 1 Mass. 8, where the acts were participated in by both parties, without objection, and were intended to be private and concealed]; State v. Millard, 18 Vt. 574, 46 Am. Dec. 170. "The word 'open' qualifies the intention of the perpetrator of the act; it does not fairly imply that it must be public, in the sense of being in a public place, or in the presence of many people. The offence created does not depend on the number present. It is enough if it be an intentional act of lewd exposure, offensive to one or more persons present. To hold otherwise would be to hold that one might commit with impunity any act of indecency, however gross, before any number of individuals successively." Com. v. Wardell, 128 Mass. 52, 54, 35 Am. Rep. 357; Grisham v. State, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 589. See also State v. Millard, 18 Vt. 574, 46 Am. Dec. 170; State v. Juneau, 88 Wis. 180, 59 N. W. 580, 43 Am. St. Rep. 877, 24 L. R. A. 857.

Lewdness is deemed to be open only when it is committed in the presence of another, or in a place open to the public view. Williams v. People, 67 Ill. App. 344.

"In any public place."— Under a statute providing for the punishment of any person who should be "guilty of notorious lewdness . . . in any public place," a public highway was held not to be such a public place as the statute contemplated (Williams v. State, 64 Ind. 553, 31 Am. Rep. 135); and under some statutes punishing the offense of indecent exposure, it is not necessary that such exposure be made to any person (State v. Bauguess, 106 Iowa 107, 76 N. W. 508).

III. DEFENSES.

A. Marriage or Divorce. The marriage of the parties at the time of the alleged offense is a defense to a prosecution for unlawful cohabitation;[15] but a subsequent marriage is no defense.[16] A void divorce obtained prior to defendant's second marriage is no defense to a prosecution for living in open and notorious fornication.[17]

B. Innocence of Co-Defendant. The absence of a guilty intent may be shown in the defense of either of the parties, but it cannot inure to the benefit of the other who was guilty.[18]

IV. INDICTMENT OR INFORMATION.

A. In General. An indictment or information for illicit cohabitation or other lewdness must charge with certainty every element necessary to constitute the offense.[19] Lewdness as a statutory offense may be charged either in the language of the statute,[20] where the statute sets out all the elements of the offense with sufficient certainty,[21] or in language of like import and equivalent meaning.[22]

B. Particular Averments — 1. SEX OF DEFENDANTS. An indictment for illegal cohabitation should charge the parties to be of different sexes, and that they cohabitated as husband and wife.[23]

2. MARRIAGE. The existence of the marriage relation between the parties should be either expressly or impliedly negatived.[24] The indictment must also allege, expressly or impliedly, that the parties were or were not married to another, where the statute makes this an element of the offense, but not otherwise.[25]

3. COHABITATION. An indictment for lewd and lascivious cohabitation or living in adultery or fornication must allege that the parties cohabited or lived together or with each other, and that they did so as husband and wife, where this is an essential element under the statute.[26]

4. NOTORIETY. An indictment for lewdness should charge that the acts constituting the offense were openly and notoriously committed, where this is an essential element of the offense.[27]

5. TIME OF OFFENSE. Unlawful cohabitation being a continued offense may properly be charged as having been committed between certain days, and proof of cohabitation at any time between such days is sufficient.[28] However, it has been held sufficient to charge the offense as having been committed on a certain day, without a continuando.[29]

6. MISCELLANEOUS AVERMENTS. Where such facts are essential elements of the offense charged, it should be alleged that there was habitual sexual intercourse,[30] or that a "notorious act of public indecency" was committed.[31] It need not be alleged that the offense was committed to the common nuisance of the people of the commonwealth.[32] And an indictment for unlawful cohabitation against a negro and a certain woman, spinster, is good, without stating the descent of the woman.[33]

C. Joinder of Parties. While the weight of authority seems to be that, although unlawful cohabitation is a joint offense,[34] the participants may be indicted either jointly or severally,[35] it has been held that they must be joined in the same information or indictment, unless one of them be unknown or since dead.[36] If jointly indicted it is within the discretion of the court whether they shall be tried jointly or separately.[37]

V. EVIDENCE.

38. See, generally, WITNESSES.

feme defendant may testify as to her marriage to him,[39] but a divorced husband is incompetent to testify as to the adulterous intercourse, or any other fact which occurred while the marriage subsisted.[40]

B. Presumptions and Burden of Proof — 1. Marriage. The single state being presumed until the contrary is shown, the burden is upon defendants to prove marriage.[41]

2. Criminal Intent. Habitual sexual intercourse being shown, a criminal intent will be presumed, and need not be proved by the state.[42]

C. Admissibility — 1. In General. The general rules governing the admissibility of evidence in criminal cases apply in prosecutions for this offense.[43] Confessions or admissions of one defendant are admissible against himself or herself,[44] but the jury should be cautioned that they are to operate only against the party making them.[45]

2. As to Intercourse. The fact of illicit intercourse, from its very nature, can rarely be directly proved, and therefore circumstantial evidence is of necessity admissible to prove it.[46] Hearsay evidence, including rumor, is inadmissible.[47]

3. As to Chastity. Evidence of the bad reputation of the woman for chastity is admissible against her co-defendant.[48]

Evidence tending to show the relation.— While occasional acts of illicit intercourse do not establish guilt, they are admissible in connection with other facts, such as the birth of a child, defendant's occupying the same room with the woman, etc. State v. Kirkpatrick, 63 Iowa 554, 19 N. W. 660. Evidence that when defendant and his paramour were arrested, she was living in the same house with him, and was cooking his breakfast, that there was but one bed in the house, and that when she and defendant were leaving they took their clothes from the same box under the bed, is admissible. Brown v. State, 108 Ala. 18, 18 So. 811. And it is competent to show that defendant furnished his paramour with groceries and provisions. Hill v. State, 137 Ala. 66, 34 So. 406. Compare State v. Coffey, 44 Mo. App. 455. Where the state had introduced evidence that defendant supported his alleged paramour at his house, it was held competent for defendant to show that the woman was staying at the place under a contract to work for his father. Hill v. State, 137 Ala. 66, 34 So. 406.

47. Evidence that it was the general rumor of the neighborhood that the parties were living in adultery is not admissible to prove that fact. Overstreet v. State, 3 How. (Miss.) 328; Buttram v. State, 4 Coldw. (Tenn.) 171; Belcher v. State, 8 Humphr. (Tenn.) 63.

48. State v. Berry, 24 Mo. App. 466, holding also that the woman is to be protected against its effect by instructions limiting it.

4. Prior or Subsequent Acts of Familiarity. Prior acts of familiarity between the parties may be proved to illustrate and characterize the acts and conduct of the parties complained of as constituting the particular offense charged,[49] if not too remote in point of time to afford a reasonable inference of guilt.[50] Such evidence is only admissible, however, when offered in connection with, or subsequently to, the introduction of evidence tending to prove the offense charged.[51] Evidence of subsequent intimacy tending to show a continued illicit relation between the parties is admissible.[52]

D. Weight and Sufficiency — 1. In General. The evidence to sustain a conviction must, as in other cases, be sufficient to establish the guilt of the parties beyond all reasonable doubt.[53] Evidence wholly circumstantial may be sufficient to support a conviction.[54] The weight and sufficiency of the evidence is for the jury to determine, in view of all the circumstances of the case.[55]

2. As to Marriage. The fact of marriage must be proved by direct evidence,[56]

56. State v. Coffee, 39 Mo. App. 56. On an indictment against two persons for lascivious cohabitation, one of the parties being married, the testimony of the alleged husband's sister that he and the woman left witness' house for the declared purpose of going to the house of a clergyman, about two miles distant, in order to be married by him, and that after an absence sufficient for that purpose they returned, declared that they were married, and lived together as man and wife, having several children, is not sufficient to prove the marriage. Com. v. Littlejohn, 15 Mass. 163.

Common-law marriage.—In Alabama, where common-law marriages by consent followed by cohabitation, without ceremony or solemnization, are valid, it was held that where, on trial of a divorced husband for living in adultery with another woman, there was evidence that, after the decree of divorce, he and his former wife, in the presence of witnesses, agreed to "let the past be the past, and from that time on they would again live together as man and wife," and that from then to the time of the trial they had lived together as husband and wife, whether they were remar-and cannot be established by reputation alone.[57] Direct evidence consists of the record of the clergyman or other person who performed the ceremony,[58] and the testimony of witnesses who were present.[59] Defendant's confession or admission of marriage may also be sufficient evidence to prove that fact.[60]

3. As to Carnal Intercourse. The fact of intercourse must usually be inferred from circumstances,[61] which should be sufficient to produce a belief or conviction of the judgment that the parties have been cohabiting.[62]

VI. Trial and Judgment.[63]

A. Instructions. Defendants are entitled to an instruction that the evidence must establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.[64] Instructions should not be misleading,[65] on the weight of evidence,[66] or based on facts which there is no evidence to support.[67]

B. Verdict and Judgment. Although jointly indicted, defendants may be tried separately,[68] and one may be convicted and sentenced before the trial of the other.[69] Indeed it seems that one of the parties may be convicted and the other acquitted,[70] although there are decisions to the contrary.[71]

VII. Sentence and Punishment.

The punishment for the offense is governed by statute.[72]

Double sense of term.—It is used either generally, as including every kind of obligation, or in the more special sense to denote inchoate, future, unascertained, or imperfect obligations, as opposed to "debts," the essence of which is that they are ascertained and certain. Rapalje & L. L. Dict. [quoted in State v. Sheets, 26 Utah 105, 108, 72 Pac. 334].

Bond not included see Los Angeles v. Teed, 112 Cal. 319, 327, 44 Pac. 580. To the same effect see Reynolds v. Lyon County, 121 Iowa 733, 738, 96 N. W. 1096.

I. DEFINITIONS.

A. Libel. A definition of libel which has frequently met with judicial approval is as follows: A libel is a malicious publication, expressed either in printing or writing, or by signs and pictures tending either to blacken the memory of one dead or the reputation of one who is alive, and expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule.[1] It has been said, however, by Chief Justice Sherwood, in

B. Slander. The word "slander" is the general and original word for all kinds of defamation,[3] and at an early day in the history of the common law the term applied both to oral and written defamations of character.[4] In this sense it has been defined to be the defaming of a man in his reputation by speaking or writing words from whence any injury in character or property arises, or may arise to him of whom the words are used.[5] But in modern usage it has been limited to defamation by words spoken,[6] and in this sense may be defined as the speaking of base and defamatory words which tend to the prejudice of the reputation, office, trade, business, or means of getting a living of another.[7]

C. Slander of Title. Although the term "slander" is more appropriate to the defamation of the character of an individual, yet the term "slander of title" has by common use become a well known and recognized phrase of the law, and an action therefor is permitted to be maintained against one person who falsely and maliciously disparages the title of another person to property, whether such property be real or personal, in consequence of which such other person is caused to suffer some special pecuniary loss or damage.[8]

D. Scandalum Magnatum. Under ancient statutes in England words spoken in derogation of a peer, a judge, or other great officer of the realm, which were called scandalum magnatum, were at one time held to be more heinous than slanders spoken of ordinary private persons and would give rise either to a civil or criminal action, although the words were such as would not be actionable in the case of a common person.[9] But the statutes of scandalum magnatum,[10] which had long been practically obsolete, were repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act of 1887;[11] and it is said that scandalum magnatum is unknown in the United States.[12]

II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

A. The Right Invaded by Actionable Defamation. The enjoyment of private reputation, unassailed, is as much a constitutional right as the possession of life, liberty, or property.[13] The foundation of an action for defamation, whether libel or slander, is the injury done to reputation;[14] injury to the feelings is not sufficient to justify a recovery.[15] Nor can such injury arise if there is no publication.[16] Words which are not in their nature defamatory, while perhaps if false and malicious, and if used by a person who knows or ought to know that special damage will follow and such damage does in fact follow, an action, as for instance an action on the case, may be maintained,[17] yet cannot be made the basis of an action for libel or slander.[18]

B. Damage as a Prerequisite to Recovery. The law recognized two classes of damages in suits for defamation — general and special.[19] Special damages are such as are computable in money.[20] General damages are those which the law presumes must actually, proximately, and necessarily result from the publication of the defamatory matter.[21] The latter arise by inference of law and are not required to be proved by evidence and are allowable whenever the immediate tendency of the words is to impair plaintiff's reputation, although no actual pecuniary loss has in fact resulted;[22] the words from which the law presumes injury in such case being deemed actionable per se.[23] All other defamation is actionable per quod, that is, special damages must be alleged and proven.[24]

III. DEFAMATORY WORDS AND ACTS.

A. Libelous Words and Acts — 1. In General. The courts have long recognized a distinction between written and oral defamation. While whatever charge will sustain a suit for slander when the words are merely spoken will sustain a suit for libel if they are written or printed and published, yet many charges which if merely spoken of another would not be actionable without proof of special damages will be libelous per se when written or printed and published.[25] Accordingly it may be stated as a general proposition that words written or printed may be libelous and actionable per se, that is, actionable without any allegations of special damages, if they tend to expose plaintiff to public hatred, contempt, ridicule, aversion, or disgrace and to induce an evil opinion of him in the minds of right-thinking persons and to deprive him of their friendly intercourse and society, even though the same words if spoken would not have been actionable.[26] Some of the courts, however, while recognizing the rule as between verbal and written or printed slander is well founded in principle.[27] The reasons usually assigned for this distinction between written and spoken slander is that the former is in more permanent form and may be circulated more extensively than the latter and therefore is calculated to do much greater injury than slander merely spoken;[28] and further that a written slander requires deliberation

This rule has been applied to the following written or printed epithets or imputations: "Anarchist" (Cerveny v. Chicago Daily News Co., 139 Ill. 345, 28 N. E. 692, 13 L. R. A. 864 [reversing 35 Ill. App. 560]. See also Lewis v. Daily News Co., 81 Md. 466, 32 Atl. 246, 29 L. R. L. 624); "itchy old toad" (Villers v. Monsley, 2 Wils. C. P. 403); "black sheep" (McGregor v. Gregory, 2 Dowl. P. C. N. S. 769, 12 L. J. Exch. 204, 11 M. & W. 287); "skunk" (Pledger v. State, 77 Ga. 242, 3 S. E. 320, where the words were: "Leave the old 'skunk' to himself;" Massuere v. Dickens, 70 Wis. 83, 35 N. W. 349); "egotistical and over-estimated, self-conceited jackass" (Moley v. Barager, 77 Wis. 43, 45 N. W. 1082); "enormous swine, which lives on lame horses" (Solverson v. Peterson, 64 Wis. 198, 25 N. W. 14, 54 Am. Rep. 607); "dangerous, able and seditious agitator" (Wilkes v. Shields, 62 Minn. 426, 64 N. W. 921). But a complaint charging that defendant by whom plaintiff had been previously employed had in writing accused the latter with being a "labor agitator" was held not to be sufficient to render defendant liable in the absence of averments that the words bore an actionable meaning. Wabash R. Co. v. Young, 162 Ind. 102, 69 N. E. 1003. So the word "hogs" applied to plaintiffs in a newspaper is not libelous where as explained by other portions of the published article it merely accused plaintiffs of being deficient in some quality which the law did not require them as good citizens to possess. Urban v. Helmick, 15 Wash. 155, 45 Pac. 747.

Allegorical or figurative allusions.— Allegorical or figurative allusions which tend to bring a person into contempt are libelous per se. Hoare v. Silverlocks, 12 Q. B. 624, 12 Jur. 695, 17 L. J. Q. B. 306, 64 E. C. L. 624, holding that in an action for writing and publishing of plaintiff, that his warmest friends "in giving up the advocacy of her claims, stated that they had realized the fable of the Frozen Snake," if not guilty be pleaded and a verdict of guilty found, plaintiff is entitled to judgment, since the jury may have understood that the words "Frozen Snake" were meant to charge plaintiff with ingratitude to friends. But it is not actionable to refer to a person as a "Man Friday" where there is no averment to show a derogatory meaning. Forbes v. King, 1 Dowl. P. C. 672.

tract,[36] as a defense. To accuse one of being deficient in some quality which the law does not require him as a good citizen to possess is not libelous per se.[37] Mere general abuse and scurrility, however ill-natured and vexatious, is no more actionable when written than when spoken, if it does not convey a degrading charge or imputation.[38] It is generally held that notices to the public announcing the cessation of business relations between the writer and another are not libelous per se, unless statements are published which are unnecessary for the purposes of the notice.[39] Words in disparagement of goods, relating to the quality of articles made, produced, or sold, but containing no imputations in themselves affecting personal character or reputation, are not held to be libelous per se.[40]

2. Particular Imputations — a. Imputations of Falsehood. Written charges imputing falsehood in direct form, or words implying want of veracity, are libelous per se.[41] But a written or printed publication which does not attack the personal

a nature as to reflect upon the character and integrity of plaintiff and tend to subject him to a loss of public confidence and respect; and a writing, although charging wrongful conduct or dereliction of duty, is not libelous per se, within the meaning of the rule, unless it imputes a dishonest or fraudulent motive or intent.[47]

c. Imputations of Indebtedness or Delinquency in Paying Debts. A publication which imputes an unwillingness or refusal to pay just debts is libelous per se, as tending to destroy the party's reputation for integrity and fair dealing.[48] So it is generally held libelous per se to publish or cause to be published one's name as a delinquent debtor or as one unworthy of financial credit.[49] But when the charge does not affect a person in his business or profession, it is not libelous per se to publish of him that he owes money,[50] or to charge him with mere inability

47. Colorado.— Bush v. McMann, 12 Colo. App. 504, 55 Pac. 956, holding that a letter from a landlord to a mortgagee of his tenant's chattels that the tenant has made no arrangements for the rent and that he will thereafter look to the mortgagee for the rent is not libelous per se.

Iowa.— O'Connell v. Scontz, 126 Iowa 709, 102 N. W. 807, holding that a notice from a county officer to a taxpayer that the officer had been apprised that the taxpayer had moneys not listed for taxation is not libelous as containing a charge of defrauding the state.

50. Hollenbeck v. Hall, 103 Iowa 214, 72 N. W. 518, 64 Am. St. Rep. 175, 39 L. R. A. 734; Windisch-Muhlhauser Brewing Co. v. Bacon, 53 S. W. 520, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 928; Fry v. McCord, 95 Tenn. 678, 33 S. W. 568; McCann v. Edinburgh Roperie Co., L. R. 28 Ir. 24 (holding that the words, "If you do not remit, the matter will be reported to our Dublin solicitors," are not libelous to pay his debts,[51] or failure to pay a debt.[52] So it has been held that a written or printed statement that plaintiff is "slow" in the payment of his bills, but not to the extent that his promises are not kept, or that it is unnecessary to place a claim in the hands of a collector, or to put it into judgment in order to secure payment, or that he ever disputes his bills, is not actionable per se.[53]

d. Imputations of Libelous or Slanderous Acts. A written or printed publication charging a person with uttering or publishing slanderous or libelous matter is actionable per se, as such an imputation is calculated to degrade and disgrace the party and bring him into ill-repute.[54]

e. Imputations of Mental Disease. A charge imputing insanity is libelous per se because it tends to expose one to public contempt and ridicule.[55] On the same theory publications asserting that a person is afflicted with mania for the destruction of persons or animals,[56] or a disease similar to hydrophobia,[57] are libelous per se. So publications imputing mere impairment of mental faculties or intellectual weakness not amounting to insanity are libelous per se.[58]

f. Imputations of Cruelty. Written or printed charges of cruelty or heart-per se); Reg. v. Coghlan, 4 F. & F. 316 (holding that an offer to sell a debt is not libelous per se).

57. See Stewart v. Swift Specific Co., 76 Ga. 280, 2 Am. St. Rep. 40, a publication charging that the bite of a cat had caused a person to purr, mew, and endeavor to catch rats, and to otherwise act like a cat.

58. Morse v. Times-Republican Printing Co., 124 Iowa 707, 100 N. W. 867 (holding that an article calculated to exhibit plaintiff as a shallow and ridiculous person is libelous per se); Belknap v. Ball, 83 Mich. 583, 47 N. W. 674, 21 Am. St. Rep. 622, 11 L. R. A. 72 (holding that the words, "I don't propose to go into debate on the tariff differences on wool, quinine, and all the things, because I ain't built that way," printed and published in a coarse and blotted imitation of the handwriting of plaintiff, who was a candidate for office, and with an imitation of the genuine signature of plaintiff attached are libelous as tending to show him to be ignorant, illiterate, and incapable of intelligently performing his duties as a member of congress); Wood v. Boyle, 177 Pa. St. 620, 35 Atl. 853, 55 Am. St. Rep. 747 (holding that to publish of a person that he is "without brains" is libelous per se); Candrian v. Miller, 98 Wis. 164, 73 N. W. 1004 (holding that to charge one in a letter with being incapable of thinking, and with being a "stupid blockhead," an "idiot" and a "fool" is libelous per se). Compare Mayrant v. Richardson, 1 Nott & M. (S. C.) 347, 9 Am. Dec. 707, holding that written words imputing mere weakness of understanding to a candidate for office are not actionable per se; since such words, while they may be less and inhuman conduct are actionable per se, since they excite the hatred of the community.[59]

g. Imputations of Roguery, Rascality, and General Depravity. A written or printed publication imputing roguery, rascality, or general depravity, which carries with it a charge of moral turpitude and degradation of character, the natural tendency of which is to hold the party up to contempt and expose him to the reprobation of the virtuous and honorable is libelous per se.[60] Thus it is libelous calculated to excite compassion, do not excite hatred, ridicule, or contempt.

59. Republican Pub. Co. v. Mosman, 15 Colo. 399, 24 Pac. 1051 (charging a husband with abusing his wife by taking away her young child and with not providing sufficient fuel to keep her warm); O'Rourke v. Lewiston Daily Sun Pub. Co., 89 Me. 310, 36 Atl. 398; Saunders v. Post-Standard Co., 107 N. Y. App. Div. 84, 94 N. Y. Suppl. 993 (holding that published statements that an owner of injured cattle had hitched a team to them and dragged them some distance, "breaking bones that had not already been broken," and had left them in a dying condition for some time, until they were killed by an officer of the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, were libelous per se); Churchill v. Hunt, 2 B. & Ald. 685, 1 Chit. 480, 22 Rex. Rep. 807, 18 E. C. L. 263 (a charge of attending a public ball after having killed a pedestrian by negligent driving).

Cruelty to children.— In Fenstermaker v. Tribune Pub. Co., 12 Utah 439, 43 Pac. 112, 13 Utah 532, 45 Pac. 1097, 35 L. R. A. 611, 12 Utah 439, it was held that a written publication charging one with cruel treatment of a child is actionable per se. See also Lothrop v. Adams, 133 Mass. 471, 43 Am. Rep. 528. Compare Geisler v. Brown, 6 Nebr. 254 [disapproved in World Pub. Co. v. Mullen, 43 Nebr. 126, 61 N. W. 108, 47 Am. St. Rep. 737], holding that words charging a woman with being an inhuman stepmother and with beating her child over the head unmercifully with a club was not libelous per se.

Cruelty to animals.— See Loker v. Campbell, 163 Mass. 242, 39 N. E. 1038, a charge of unnecessarily failing to provide cattle with proper shelter and protection from the weather.

60. California.—Schomberg v. Walker, 132 Cal. 224, 64 Pac. 290.

Delaware.— Croasdale v. Bright, 6 Houst. 52, holding that publishing of one that he is a "miserable specimen of humanity, who . . . attacks private character, business interests, the sanctity of home and desecrates the memory of the dead" is libelous per se.

Georgia.— Stewart v. Swift Specific Co., 76 Ga. 280, 2 Am. St. Rep. 40, holding that a printed publication charging that a daughter voluntarily furnished for publication matter holding her mother up to ridicule by representing her mother as afflicted with a disease similar to hydrophobia, due to the bite of a cat and ascribing to her conduct consisting of acts like a cat is libelous per se, since it imputes to the daughter ungrateful and unfilial conduct.

Indiana.— Crocker v. Hadley, 102 Ind. 416, 1 N. E. 734 (holding that to publish of a party, "He has sold himself, Judas-like, for a few pieces of silver, to sell his neighbors out," is libelous per se); Johnson v. Stebbins, 5 Ind. 364.

3. Caricatures, Pictures, Signs, or Effigies. An actionable libel may be published by means of pictures, caricatures,[89] signs,[90] or effigies.[91]

B. Oral Communications — 1. In General. Oral defamation as a cause of action has been divided into five classes, as follows: (1) Words falsely spoken of a person which impute to the party the commission of some criminal offense involving moral turpitude for which the party, if the charge be true, may be indicted and punished. (2) Words falsely spoken of a person which impute that the party is infected with some contagious disease, where, if the charge is true, it would exclude the party from society. (3) Defamatory words falsely spoken of

v. Sun Printing, etc., Assoc., 99 N. Y. App. Div. 367, 91 N. Y. Suppl. 193 (holding that an article stating that plaintiff was about to be married, that the guests had assembled but the bridegroom failed to appear, that plaintiff fell to the floor with a scream and the guests made a rush for the tables is libelous); McFadden v. Morning Journal Assoc., 28 N. Y. App. Div. 508, 51 N. Y. Suppl. 275 (holding that a newspaper story describing a boat-race between plaintiff and another young lady as "a race for a beau with a handsome face" with other similar matter is libelous per se); Tobin v. Sykes, 71 Hun 469, 24 N. Y. Suppl. 943 (holding that it is libelous per se to refer to a woman as a "miserable drunken brute" and to state that "she sends her children for beer daily, and cruelly beats them").

Pennsylvania.— Oles v. Pittsburg Times, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 130, 38 Wkly. Notes Cas. 461 (charging a woman old and poor with being a witch and with having bewitched a little boy, where it appeared that the paper in which the article was published circulated among people who believed in witchcraft); Mix v. North American Co., 12 Pa. Dist. 446, 17 York Leg. Rec. 49.

Wisconsin.— Kay v. Jansen, 87 Wis. 118, 58 N. W. 245 (publishing of a woman whose son was in the state industrial school "we know the tree by the fruit"); Allen v. News Pub. Co., 81 Wis. 120, 50 N. W. 1093 (charging a widow with making remarks regarding the sex and masculine powers of her deceased husband); Cary v. Allen, 39 Wis. 481 (charging that a certain person had absconded and that plaintiff, a woman, had gone to meet him).

a person which impute to the party unfitness to perform the duties of an office or employment of profit, or the want of integrity in the discharge of the duties of such an office or employment. (4) Defamatory words falsely spoken of a party which prejudice such party in his or her profession or trade. (5) Defamatory words falsely spoken of a person which, although not in themselves actionable, occasion the party special damage.[92] In a few jurisdictions this classification has, apart from statute, been enlarged to some extent, as for instance, by permitting recovery without proof of special damages for imputations of unchastity in a female, although no crime is charged;[93] or generally for words spoken of a female, having a tendency to wound her feelings, bring her into contempt, and prevent her from occupying the position in society, to which she is entitled, as a woman.[94] So it has been suggested that still another class of oral words be added as being actionable per se, viz., charges which are deemed exceptionably disgraceful in particular localities,[95] as for instance in South Carolina, charging a white person with being a mulatto.[96] The classification of defamation into that which is actionable per se and that which is actionable per quod has never been adopted in Louisiana, but there the rule of civil law obtains that all oral defamations producing any perceptible injury to the reputation of another are actionable.[97]

2. Oral Defamation Not Actionable Per Se — a. In General. Oral words not included within the first four classes of words actionable per se as enumerated above[98] are not as a general rule actionable per se, and without proof of special damage, although tending to expose to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule.[99]

(v) Imputations of Mental Weakness and Incapacity. Oral imputations of insanity, mental weakness, and incapacity are not actionable per se unless spoken of a person in his business or professional capacity.[21]

(vi) Imputations of Negro Blood in White Persons. The general rule is that to call a white person a negro or mulatto is not actionable per se.[22]

(vii) Charge of Harboring Runaway Slaves. It has been held that a charge of harboring runaway slaves is not slanderous per se.[23]

(viii) Words of Abuse. Mere words of common abuse are not actionable per se.[24] But if an actionable wrong is otherwise committed, it may be shown that it was accompanied with words of common abuse, to enhance the damages.[25]

(ix) Words Imputing Illegitimacy. Oral words charging a person with being a bastard are not actionable per se.[26]

C. Words Made Actionable Per Se by Statute. By statute in some jurisdictions it is provided that all words which from their usual construction and common acceptation are considered as insults and tend to violence and breach of the peace are actionable.[27] Under statutes containing such provisions, it has been held that such words are held to be actionable under statute whether they be spoken[28] or

In Louisiana, where the courts are not bound by the technical distinctions of the common law as to words actionable per se, and words not actionable per se, it has been held that charging a white person with being a negro is calculated to inflict injury and damage and hence may support an action for slander. Spotorno v. Fourichon, 40 La. Ann. 423, 4 So. 71.

In South Carolina in some early cases it was held to be actionable to call a white person a mulatto on the ground that under the laws of that state a mulatto was deprived of all his civil rights and liable to be tried in all cases without a jury. An oral charge of the commission of a felony is actionable per se.[36] So an oral charge of the commission of a misdemeanor may be slanderous per se as well as the charge of a felony.[37] A misdemeanor, however, is ordinarily not punishable by an infamous punishment; hence, in order that a charge of such offense may be actionable per se, it is necessary that it be indictable and involve moral turpitude.[38]

In Missouri the rule of the text has been criticized on the ground that it "lacks certainty; for the terms 'moral turpitude' and 'infamous' are of indefinite import, and men differ as to the quality of an act according to their own standard of morality;" and it has been said that the "rule that is safest and most certain in this application is, that words are in themselves actionable which impute an indictable offense for which corporal punishment may be inflicted as the immediate punishment, and not as the consequence of a failure to satisfy a pecuniary penalty." general rule the offense charged must be one which is indictable and punishable either at common law or under statute.[39] Hence it is not actionable per se to charge "desertion," since such offense is of a purely military character,[40] or to charge the commission of a crime punishable by a town ordinance only.[41] It has been held, however, that the form of criminal procedure under which the offense is punished is immaterial and that it is not essential that the offense be indictable, it being sufficient that it is punishable summarily, as upon complaint and warrant.[42]

d. What Constitutes Moral Turpitude. Moral turpitude in this connection has been defined to be an act of baseness, vileness, or depravity in the private and social duties which a man owes to his fellow-man or to society in general, contrary to the accepted and customary rule of right and duty between man and man.[43]

e. Character of Punishment — (I) What Constitutes an Infamous Punishment. "Infamous punishment" is generally used as synonymous with "corporal punishment."[44] In some jurisdictions moreover imprisonment in the penitentiary as opposed to a common jail is essential.[45]

(II) Punishment by Fine. There is a divergence of authority as to the character of punishment necessary to render actionable an imputation of an offense involving moral turpitude but not subjecting to infamous punishment. In some states corporal punishment is essential,[46] and that as the immediate punishment and not merely as a consequence of failure to pay fine.[47] In other states punishment by pecuniary fine alone may be sufficient.[48] An oral charge of an offense

Offenses not involving moral turpitude.— The following are examples of offenses held not to involve moral turpitude: Breaking open and reading a letter sent by mail (Hillhouse v. Peck, 2 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 395; Ludlum v. McCuen, 17 N. J. L. 12), trading with negroes (Heath v. Devaughn, 37 Ala. 677), assault and battery (Dudley v. Horn, 21 Ala. 379), taking away standing corn (Stitzell v. Reynolds, 59 Pa. involving moral turpitude, but punishable by corporal punishment, is slanderous per se, although the offense is also subject to alternative punishment by fine.[49]

3. Crime For Which Party Is Not Liable to Punishment — a. In General. It is not necessary that the language used, in order to be slanderous, should be so spoken as if true to expose the person concerning whom it is uttered to a criminal prosecution.[50] That is one of the tests by which to determine whether it constitutes a good cause of action, but it is not the only one. The other is that it imputes to a person a species of misconduct to which the law attaches a criminal punishment, and that thereby he is subjected to obloquy, social degradation and disrepute.[51] The imputation of crime is essential as a test whether the words used do amount to legal slander,[52] but it does not take away their actionable qualities that they are so spoken as to indicate that the party has suffered the penalty of the law or is no longer exposed to danger of punishment.[53]

b. Offense Barred by Statute of Limitations. The fact that prosecution for the crime charged is barred by the statute of limitations is no defense.[54]

c. Repeal of Statute Creating Offense. Words published since the repeal of a criminal statute, charging a violation thereof prior to the repeal are actionable, although no criminal prosecution would now lie.[55]

d. Effect of Pardon. So the fact that the liability to punishment is discharged by a pardon prior to the publication of the words imputing a crime will not deprive plaintiff of his right of action.[56]

e. Sentence Already Served. Words charging the commission of a criminal offense may be actionable, although they are so spoken as to indicate that the party has suffered the penalty of the law.[57]

To charge a person with the commission of a crime, the corpus of which never existed, is notwithstanding actionable,[58] unless by reason of qualifying or explanatory statements at the time or otherwise the fact that no crime had in fact been committed was known or ought to have been known to the person addressed.[59]

5. Crime Incapable of Commission by Party Defamed. It is actionable per se to charge one with the commission of a crime impossible of commission by the person defamed because of physical incapacity, minority, or other reason,[60] unless such impossibility was known or communicated to the hearers.[61]

6. Imputation of Arrest, Incarceration, Indictment, or Conviction of Crime. Similarly and upon a parity of reasoning, it is well established that an imputation of arrest,[62] indictment,[63] conviction,[64] or imprisonment[65] for crime is equivalent to an imputation of the commission of such crime and is actionable.

7. Crime Committed in Another State or Jurisdiction. It is not essential that the offense charged should be cognizable and punishable within the jurisdiction where the slander was published and to whose tribunals resort is had for redress.[66] But an action will not lie for words spoken in another state imputing the commission of a crime in that state when the offense charged is not indictable in that state, although it may be indictable in the state where redress is sought.[67] Whether words are slanderous per se as charging the commission of a criminal offense where they were spoken in a state other than that in which the alleged crime was committed has been held not to depend upon the laws of the state where they were spoken but upon the laws of the state in which the act is charged to have taken place.[68] Accordingly it is held that where the offense is charged to have been committed in another jurisdiction it must be alleged and shown to be an infamous offense or one involving moral turpitude in the jurisdiction in which the act is alleged to have been committed.[69] Where, however, the act charged as having been committed in another state is according to common law[70] and the municipal law of every civilized country[71] an offense of the character required, to render the charge actionable per se, it will not be necessary to allege and prove affirmatively the law of the state in which the alleged offense was committed. So words charging an offense committed in a foreign jurisdiction other than a sister state are actionable per se if the act charged is of such a nature that the court can presume it is a crime in such jurisdiction.[72] The state courts take judicial notice of the criminal laws of the United States and the imputation of an act which is in violation of such laws may sustain an action for slander in the state courts without averment and affirmative proof of the criminality of the act in question under the federal laws.[73]

8. Charging Intention or Disposition to Commit Crime. Spoken words charging merely an intention or disposition to commit crime in the future are not actionable, since such intent constitutes no crime.[74] But where an intent to commit a crime is coupled with an overt act so as to constitute a distinct offense in itself, words charging such offense may be actionable per se.[75] Written words imputing a criminal disposition to another are libelous per se.[76]

9. Imputations of Attempts to Commit Crime. A charge of an attempt to commit a crime is, when such attempt constitutes a criminal offense, actionable per se in the same way and under the same conditions as charges of other crimes.[77]

Delaware.— Layton v. Harris, 3 Harr. 406, holding that a letter informing the recipient that money had been deposited for him with plaintiff to enable him to vote a certain ticket is a libel upon plaintiff.

Indiana.— Heilman v. Shanklin, 60 Ind. 424, holding that in an action for charging bribery of voters it is immaterial that the person alleged to have been bribed was not a legal voter.

Michigan.— Randall v. Evening News Assoc., 79 Mich. 266, 44 N. W. 783, 7 L. R. A. 309, holding that a caricature of a member of the legislature representing him as using liquor and money to secure the passage of a bill is libelous per se.

Missouri.— McGinnis v. Knapp, 109 Mo. 131, 18 S. W. 1134, holding that a newspaper article headed, "The McGinnis Cohorts," and, "They Rally 'Round the Brewers' Flag in the Senate," and stating that the "distribution of the $50,000 slush fund, sent here by the liquor interests, may enable Senator McGinnis to make good his boast" that he could defeat a bill is libelous per se.

2. Iron Age Pub. Co. v. Crudup, 85 Ala. 519, 5 So. 332; Mallory v. Pioneer-Press Co., 34 Minn. 521, 26 N. W. 904 (holding that a publication stating that plaintiff "has disappeared with some of his employer's funds, and the police have been notified" charges embezzlement and is libelous per se); Hart v. Sun Printing, etc., Assoc., 79 Hun (N. Y.) 358, 29 N. Y. Suppl. 434 (holding that it is libelous to publish of an administrator that he was having trouble with the creditors of an estate, that he "set himself to clear the estate" and that in the clearing process "about $9,000 disappeared"); Manner v. Simpson, 13 Daly (N. Y.) 156 (holding that to publish of a discharged superintendent as a reason for his discharge that constant reports were in circulation to the effect that all the materials sent to the factory were not used in the construction of the company's pianos is libelous per se as charging embezzlement); Press Pub. Co. v. McDonald, 63 Fed. 238, 11 C. C. A. 155, 26 L. R. A. 53 [reversing 55 Fed. 264] (holding that to publish that plaintiff, the "Southern Ohio manager of the Standard Oil Co. until six months ago, when he strangely disappeared, has been located, living in luxury" in Canada, is libelous per se); Morgan v. Halberstadt, 60 Fed. 592, 9 C. C. A. 147 (holding that to publish of one that "he boasted of the manner in which he was helping himself to the company's funds" is libelous per se).

Publications held not to charge embezzlement: It is not libelous per se to publish of a discharged railway employee that he "had been discharged for failing to ring up all fares collected" (Pittsburgh, etc., Pass. R. Co. v. McCurdy, 114 Pa. St. 554, 8 Atl. 230, 60 Am. Rep. 363); to publish of one having charge of printing for an organization that he had received the money from it to pay therefor but put off payment by various excuses until compelled to pay by suit (Hackett v. Providence Tel. Pub. Co., 18 R. I. 589, 29 Atl. 143); to charge the manager of a corporation with having used and employed the goods, means, and credit of the corporation for his own benefit (Johnson v. Brown, 13 W. Va. 71); to charge a manager of a corporation with causing the failure of the corporation by "extravagant management" (Dailey v. Engineering, etc., Journal, 94 N. Y. App. Div. 314, 88 N. Y. Suppl. 6); to charge that a manager of a farmers' alliance exchange was discharged because of heavy losses in the business and that the showing of a branch office simply proved that the manager was "a man of small business capacity" (Gaither v. Advertiser Co., 102 Ala. 458, 14 So. 788); or to charge that "there was a deficit in the accounts" of plaintiff, an ex-county treasurer, where the publication also stated that it was claimed for plaintiff that the shortage was "for fees collected which belonged to the office and not to the county," and that "the matter was settled by the bondsmen before the meeting of the board" of supervisors (Hofflund v. Journal Co., 88 Wis. 369, 60 N. W. 263. See also Brown v. Boynton, 122 Mich. 251, 80 N. W. 1099). So the words, "It is wondered at how he can live in more than ordinary style . . . while having merely the honorable receipts of his agency to live upon," do not necessarily impute the crime of embezzlement and that the construction of the language was for the jury. (x) False Pretenses and Kindred Crimes. A written publication imputing that one is guilty of the crime of false pretenses, or a crime of a kindred nature, is actionable per se.[5] Indeed, even though no crime is charged, words imputing swindling or cheating may be actionable as tending to disgrace or degrade the person of whom they were written.[6]

(xi) Forgery. To charge one in writing with the crime of forgery is actionable per se.[7] But it is not libelous per se to accuse a person of forgery where the expression is not used in such a manner as to import a crime,[8] to blacken the character of plaintiff, or to expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule.[9]

(xii) Homicide. It is libelous per se to charge one with unlawfully causing charging a bailee of goods with converting them to his own use does not charge embezzlement but is libelous as tending to bring him into disgrace and disrepute. See also Easton v. Buck, 23 N. Y. Imputations held not libelous.— In Trimble v. Anderson, 79 Ala. 514, a notice warning all persons against trading for two notes, alleging that plaintiff had obtained them without consideration from a person whose mental condition at the time incapacitated him for business, was held not libelous per se, as there was no charge of fraud or dishonesty in obtaining the notes. In Greville v. Chapman, 5 Q. B. 731, Dav. & M. 553, 8 Jur. 189, 13 L. J. Q. B. 172, 48 E. C. L. 731, it was held not to be libelous per se to charge one with withdrawing a horse from a race in order to obtain an unfair advantage over those with whom he had heavy wagers on the result of the race.

7. Iowa.— Nihols v. Eaton, 110 Iowa 509, 81 N. W. 792, 80 Am. St. Rep. 319, 47 L. R. A. 483, holding that a communication by a life insurance company charging an examining physician with forging an application for insurance is libelous per se, although under the circumstances of the case it was held to be privileged. Imputations held not to charge perjury.— A notice from county officials that they had been apprised that moneys of plaintiff had been omitted from taxation is not libelous as containing a charge of having committed perjury in swearing to a false assessment. O'Connell v. Shontz, 126 Iowa 709, 102 N. W. 807. So a writing containing the words "I have heard Olsen testify on the stand time and again and I know his ability in that line," is not libelous as charging perjury. Olson v. Aubolee, 92 Minn. 312, 99 N. W. 1128. In Stewart v. Wilson, 23 Minn. 449, 452, the following words, "as Mr. Wilson has sworn to this answer, there is a good chance for the 'deacon' to bring a complaint against him for perjury. We have not the slightest doubt but there is a great deal of perjury in these numerous cases, and it ought to be shown up. We have no idea, however, that Mr. Wilson is tainted with it in the slightest," were held not to be libelous.

(xvii) Robbery. A charge of robbery is libelous per se.[29] But it has been intimated that a charge of an "attempt to rob," when construed in connection with the context, may not be actionable per se as charging the commission of a crime.[30]

(xviii) Selling Impure Food. It is libelous per se to charge one with selling diseased meats[31] or impure milk[32] in violation of a criminal statute. But, as in the case of all imputations of crime, to render a publication libelous per se as charging a violation of the health laws, the offense must be charged in language fairly and reasonably bearing that interpretation.[33]

(xix) Smuggling. To charge one with smuggling is libelous per se.[34] So a written charge of an attempt to evade and defraud the revenue laws of the United States by making out fraudulent invoices of books imported from a foreign country is libelous per se.[35]

(xx) Treason. It is libelous per se to publish a charge imputing that one is guilty of the crime of treason.[36] But a publication charging a person with taking part in a revolt or rebellion, within a foreign government other than England, is insufficient to charge a crime, in the absence of proof of the existence of some statute or law making such an act a treasonable offense.[37]

(xxi) Miscellaneous Crimes. It is libelous per se to charge one with kidnapping,[38] breaking jail,[39] suffering[40] or assisting prisoners to escape from jail,[41] selling liquors illegally,[42] illegal voting,[43] poisoning cattle,[44] making an indecent assault,[45] public decency,[46] false imprisonment,[47] unlawful interference with mail matter,[48] or with falsely impersonating a constable.[49] Similarly, to publish that plaintiff is under indictment for not canceling stamps on an empty liquor cask, the contents of which he had sold;[50] or that he has been convicted of libel;[51]

b. Imputations in Slanderous Form — (I) ABORTION. It is actionable per se orally to charge a person with the act of causing or procuring an abortion, under circumstances not allowed by law.[53] But since the common-law offense of abortion is restricted to cases in which the woman was quick with child, words charging a woman with procuring an abortion upon herself, without imputing that she was quick with child, are not actionable in the absence of statute making the act charged a punishable offense.[54]

(II) ADULTERATING FOOD PRODUCTS. Words charging a person with selling or offering for sale impure or watered milk or other adulterated food products in contravention of criminal statutes are actionable per se.[55]

(III) ALTERING BRANDS. Where the alteration or defacing of the mark or brand of any animal is an indictable offense by statute, an oral imputation or charge of such offense is actionable per se.[56] But the rule is otherwise where no such offense is recognized by statute;[57] and where such statutory offense exists, the act charged to give rise to an action without proof of special damage must be such as clearly falls within the prohibition of the statute.[58]

(v) Assault and Battery. An oral charge of assault and battery is held not to be actionable per se.[67]

(vi) Bigamy. Bigamy is an offense involving moral turpitude and an oral charge thereof is actionable per se.[68]

(vii) Blackmailing or Extortion. Charging a person with being a blackmailer is equivalent to charging such person with being guilty of the crime of extortion,[69] and is slanderous per se in jurisdictions where extortion or blackmailing is recognized as a crime.[70] But a charge of concocting a blackmailing or extortion scheme has been held not to be actionable per se as charging a criminal offense.[71]

(viii) Bribery and Embracery. Oral words charging bribery,[72] or the solicitation of a bribe,[73] or embracery,[74] are actionable per se, since such offenses involve moral turpitude.[75] But to render the words actionable per se under this rule the act charged must constitute a criminal offense.[76]

(ix) Burglary. Words charging a person with the crime of burglary are around here you had better been to home tracking the man that burned your house and you would track him in your own door. You know you burned it. You took the money and built a barn with it," is slanderous per se.

See 32 Cent. Dig. tit. "Libel and Slander," § 30.

Compare Waters v. Jones, 3 Port. (Ala.) 442, 29 Am. Dec. 261, holding that the words, "He has been at different times, close about where C's gin house was burnt, in disguise, with a sheep skin or bear skin," do not charge arson.

slanderous per se.[77] But to charge another with entering a house and carrying away goods owned by him and another as copartners is not slanderous per se.[78]

(x) Conspiracy. An oral charge of criminal conspiracy is actionable per se.[79] But it has been held not to be slanderous per se to charge a husband with entering into conspiracy with his wife to extort money from another, since a man cannot enter into a criminal conspiracy with his wife alone.[80]

(xi) Counterfeiting. It is slanderous per se to charge one with being a counterfeiter.[81] But it is held not to be actionable per se to charge one with passing counterfeit money, unless it is averred that the party knew the money to be counterfeit.[82]

(xii) Disorderly or Gambling Houses. Oral words charging one with keeping a disorderly[83] or gambling house[84] are slanderous per se.

W. 342). So to say of plaintiff that "he, or somebody, had altered the credit, or indorsement on a note, from a larger to a less sum, and that the note would speak for itself" has been held not to charge a crime against plaintiff. Ingalls v. Allen, 1 Ill. 300. So where defendant in speaking of plaintiff and of a note given by defendant to plaintiff said, "I never put my name on the back of the note, but she must have done it," the words are not actionable in the absence of an averment explaining the meaning of the words. Atkinson v. Scammon, 22 N. H. 40. Where a person's name is signed to a note by an assumed agent, his denial of the signature and the authority of such agent to sign is affirmative charge.[97] As a general rule it is actionable per se to call one a "forger,"[98] but a mere charge of forgery does not necessarily mean felonious forgery, for which alone an action lies;[99] and words stating that a person is a "forger" are not actionable per se, where such words are coupled with a charge of some act which does not of itself constitute forgery.[1] The charge must be made concerning an instrument capable of being forged.[2] Where there is a charge of forging a name to a note, the natural meaning conveyed is that the note was susceptible of forgery and the words are actionable per se.[3]

(xvi) Homicide. It is slanderous per se to charge a person with the commission of the crime of murder or manslaughter;[4] and it is immaterial that no such murder has been committed by any one, provided such fact is not known to the persons who heard the charge.[5] Thus to call one a "murderer" is slanderous per se.[6] Moreover any words which are calculated to induce the hearers to believe that the party charged is guilty of the crime are actionable per se.[7] Since every not actionable per se. Andrews v. Woodmansee, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 232.

97. Gorham v. Ives, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 534, holding that where defendant stated that a certain portion of a note had been forged and asked witness if he did not think the part forged was in plaintiff's handwriting, and also stated that he showed the note to another who said the part forged was in plaintiff's handwriting, the words were actionable per se.

7. Indiana.— O'Conner v. O'Conner, 24 Ind. 218 (holding that the words, "In room of her trying to help him, she seemed to do all she could to burry him out of the world," are actionable per se); Harrison v. Findley, 23 Ind. 265, 85 Am. Dec. 456 (holding that the words, "They have hurried more than one traveler out of the way for his money," and, "They fixed up a bottle of whisky and gave it to Luddick and Wheedon, who took it . . . and drank it, and it killed them both," are actionable per se.

New Hampshire.— Tenney v. Clement, 10 N. H. 52, holding that it is actionable per se to charge that a murder took place and that plaintiff "had a hand in it."

New York.— Secor v. Harris, 18 Barb. 425, killing is presumably felonious,[8] a charge that one has killed another is actionable per se unless explained.[9]

(XVII) INTOXICATING LIQUORS. Words imputing the sale of spirituous or intoxicating liquors in violation of law are slanderous per se.[10] But words charging a person with soliciting and obtaining liquor from one who sells it in violation of law have been held not to impute the commission of a public offense, and hence not to be actionable per se.[11]

(XVIII) LARCENY—(A) In General. As a general rule to charge one orally with the crime of larceny is actionable per se.[12] In order to be actionable per se, holding that to say of a physician that he gave the speaker's children medicine and it killed them, that they did not live long after they took it and died right off the same day, is actionable per se.

Ohio.— Liles v. Gaster, 42 Ohio St. 631, holding that words charging that a person ran away because he had poisoned a decedent named are actionable per se.

Wisconsin.— Langton v. Hagerty, 35 Wis. 150, holding that the words, "He . . . murdered the man," are actionable per se, although the person alleged to have been murdered is not named.

England.— Peake v. Oldham, Cowp. 275, 2 W. Bl. 960, holding that the words, "You are guilty," and, "You are guilty . . . rather than you should go without a hangman I will hang you," with proper innuendo, are actionable per se.

See 32 Cent. Dig. tit. "Libel and Slander," § 43.

Imputations held not to impute murder.— It has been held not to be slanderous per se to charge one with being a "bushwhacker" (Curry v. Collins, 37 Mo. 324); to say of a physician, "In my opinion the bitters that Diver fixed for Smith were the cause of his death" (Jones v. Diver, 22 Ind. 184); to say of a person, "That child belonged to Aunt Jerusha, and Eliza Higgins was her aid." "Eliza Higgins buried it." "Eliza Higgins had the young one in her cellar two or three days" (Young v. Cook, 144 Mass. 38, 10 N. E. 719); or to say that A tried to get his wife to take powders containing poison and arsenic and that if she had taken them they would have killed, as there was no administering of the poison (Rock v. McClarnon, 95 Ind. 415). So to charge that plaintiff administered morphine to another on the day he made his will does not charge that death ensued from the administration of the morphine and is not actionable per se. McFadin v. David, 78 Ind. 445, 41 Am. Rep. 587.

8. Carroll v. White, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 615.

9. Alabama.— Taylor v. Casey, Minor 258, holding that words charging homicide generally without a charge that it was felonious are actionable in themselves.

Indiana.— O'Conner v. O'Conner, 24 Ind. 218, holding that the words, "They have killed my son," are actionable as imputing murder.

Massachusetts.— Thomas v. Blasdale, 147 Mass. 438, 18 N. E. 214, holding that the words, "He knows how she came to her death. He killed her. He is to blame for her death. There was foul play there," are actionable per se.

New York.— Carroll v. White, 33 Barb. 615, holding that to say of a physician, "He has killed six children," is actionable as charging a crime.

Pennsylvania.— Eckart v. Wilson, 10 Serg. & R. 44, holding that the words, "You have killed Bob Waters; you have poisoned him, and I can prove it," are actionable per se.

Tennessee.— Hays v. Hays, 1 Humphr. 402, holding that the charge, "You have killed one negro and nearly killed another," was capable of a felonious meaning and that it was proper to submit to the jury the question whether the words imported a crime.

13. Alabama.— Holley v. Burgess, 9 Ala. 728, holding that an accusation that one has been "whipped for stealing hogs" charges larceny.

Delaware.— Kennedy v. Woodrow, 6 Houst. 46, holding that it is actionable per se to charge one with finding money and having knowledge of the owner, and with concealing it for the purpose of applying it to his own use.

Georgia.— Stancell v. Pryor, 25 Ga. 40.

Indiana.— Keesling v. McCall, 36 Ind. 321, holding that to say of one in reference to some wheat which had been stolen, "Now I don't want anything to go out from me, that I said that Tom McCall stole the wheat, for I don't know who stole it, but it looks suspicious," is actionable as charging larceny.

Iowa.— Hess v. Fockler, 25 Iowa 9 (holding that the words, "My table cloths are gone, and you know where they are. . . . You have got them. My husband has gone down town to get a warrant against you, to search your house for the table cloths and imprison you," are actionable as charging larceny); De Moss v. Haycock, 15 Iowa 149.

Kentucky.— Macauley v. Elrod, 27 S. W. 867, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 291, holding that the words, "I discharged Elrod for stealing," are slanderous per se.

Maryland.— Robinett v. Ruby, 13 Md. 95, holding that where defendant in speaking of property which had been stolen said that he no longer suspected a certain person but that "the girl that hired with us has got it" the words are actionable per se.

Minnesota.— Laury v. Evans, 87 Minn. 396, 92 N. W. 224, holding that the words, "You get out of here. You came in here to see what you could find to steal," are actionable per se.

Missouri.—Casey v. Aubuchon, 25 Mo. App. 91, holding that to say of another, "Casey has done me a dirty trick; I left him in my store, and when I came back the drawer was short five dollars," is actionable as imputing larceny.

Ohio.— Cheadle v. Buell, 6 Ohio 67, holding that words charging that one received a letter, giving himself a false name at the time and promising to deliver it but instead broke it open and used the money contained therein, are actionable as charging larceny.

South Carolina.— Mayson v. Sheppard, 12 Rich. 254 (holding that where defendant in speaking of a certain transaction said, "If that be not stealing, what do you call it?" the words are actionable per se); Davis v. Johnston, 2 Bailey 579 (holding that to say of another person, "Tell him he is riding a stolen horse, and has a stolen watch in his pocket," is actionable per se).

Tennessee.— Hancock v. Stephens, 11 Humphr. 507.

England.— Beavor v. Hides, 2 Wils. C. P. 300, holding that the words, "He was put in the roundhouse for stealing ducks at Crowland," are actionable per se.

and petit larceny in this respect.[15] Although the words spoken amount of themselves to a charge of larceny, yet if accompanied with a specification of acts upon which the charge is based, which show that no such crime was committed, the person of whom the words were spoken has no cause of action.[16] Thus if the words relate to the taking of property not a subject of larceny, they will not be actionable.[17] A charge of the commission of an act equivalent to larceny is not slanderous per se, as by implication the idea of the precise offense of larceny is excluded.[18] Where the words are capable of two constructions, the one innocent and the other importing the commission of a crime, it is necessary that extrinsic facts be averred to show that the words were intended to impute a crime and were so understood by the hearers, in order that such words may be actionable.[19]

Indiana.— Harrison v. Manship, 120 Ind. 43, 22 N. E. 87; Wilson v. McCrory, 86 Ind. 170; Hart v. Coy, 40 Ind. 553 (holding that where there is no averment of extrinsic facts, the words, "I have seen women steal yarn before," are not slanderous per se); Keesling v. McCall, 36 Ind. 321; Prichard v. Lloyd, 2 Ind. 154; Stucker v. Davis, 8 Blackf. 414 (holding that the words, "He has my horse," are not actionable per se); Wyant v. Smith, 5 Blackf. 293 (holding that the words, "I lost my hogs, and I believe he and his nearest neighbors got them," does not charge a crime).

Kentucky.— Brown v. Piner, 6 Bush 518 (holding that to say of one that he sheared another's sheep and kept the wool is not actionable per se); Jones v. McDowell, 4 Bibb 188; Porter v. Hughey, 2 Bibb 232 (holding that to say that certain persons were accustomed to "kill cattle no more theirs than mine" does not charge larceny); Clay v. Barkley, Ky. Dec. 67 (holding that the words, "He killed and salted one of my hogs," are not actionable per se).

Maine.— Brown v. Brown, 14 Me. 317, holding that the words, "Uncle Daniel must settle for some of my logs he has made away with," are not actionable per se.

Missouri.— Christal v. Craig, 80 Mo. 367; Boyce v. Anbuchon, 34 Mo. App. 315, holding that to say of another that he has gotten or hidden the speaker's money is not actionable per se.

New Jersey.—Bartow v. Brands, 15 N. J. L. 248.

New York.— Coleman v. Playsted, 36 Barb. 26.

North Carolina.— McCurry v. McCurry, 82 N. C. 296, holding that the words, "You, McCurry, are a rogue and your mother has upheld you in stealing from your cradle up," do not impute a crime to the mother (plaintiff) and are not actionable per se.

Pennsylvania.— Stitzell v. Reynolds, 59 Pa. St. 488, holding that to say of plaintiff that she "had her hogs in your corn and carried corn away" does not charge larceny); Lukehart v. Byerly, 53 Pa. St. 418; Bornman v. Boyer, 3 Binn. 515, 5 Am. Dec. 380.

South Carolina.— Sturgenegger v. Taylor, 2 Brev. 480, holding that the words, "Those two rascals killed my hogs, and converted them to their own use," are not actionable per se.

Tennessee.— Hancock v. Stephens, 11 Humphr. 507.

Texas.— McCarthy v. Miller, (Civ. App. 1900) 57 S. W. 973, holding that where defendant entered plaintiff's house in her absence and made a search, and holding up a piece of coal which he had found in plaintiff's house said, "Here is your stolen coal," the words are not actionable per se, since there is no charge that plaintiff stole the coal.

England.— Kelly v. Partington, 4 B. & Ad. 700, 3 L. J. K. B. 104, 2 N. & M. 460, 24 E. C. L. 699.

See 32 Cent. Dig. tit. "Libel and Slander," § 45.

Words imputing a mere intention to steal are not actionable per se. Seaton v. Cordray, Wright (Ohio) 101.

15. Redway v. Gray, 31 Vt. 292, holding that words charging one with stealing property of less value than seven dollars are actionable.

16. Trimble v. Foster, 87 Mo. 49, 56 Am. Rep. 440. See also Williams v. Miner, 18 Conn. 464.

17. See infra, III, D, 11, b, (XVIII), (C).

18. Thompson v. Grimes, 5 Ind. 385 (holding that the words, "He used up my stuff, made tight work of it, and appropriated the money to his own use, and I don't consider that any better than stealing," are not slanderous per se); Stokes v. Arey, 53 N. C. 66 (holding that the words, "You as good as stole old John Henly's canoe," are not actionable per se); Stees v. Kemble, 27 Pa. St. 112 (holding that the words, "A man that would do that would steal," do not charge larceny).

19. Long v. Musgrove, 75 Ala. 158; Prichard v. Lloyd, 2 Ind. 154; Wood v. Hilbish, 23 Mo. App. 389 (holding that the words, "I will not keep him all summer, for I have to watch my pocket book too close," without any prefatory averments in the petition stating extrinsic facts, do not charge a crime); Hansbrough v. Stinnett, 25 Gratt. (Va.) 495 (holding that the words, "Dick Stinnett killed my beef," are not returnable without additional averments). See also Wilson v. McCrory, 86 Ind. 170.

(B) Larceny From Dead Men. It is actionable per se to charge one with larceny of the property of a deceased person.[20]

(C) Subject of the Larceny Charged. Words actionable per se as charging larceny, if spoken in relation to a subject of which no larceny was capable of being committed, are not actionable per se.[21] If, however, the property charged to have been stolen is the subject of larceny, either at common law or under statute, the charge is actionable per se.[22]

20. Wonson v. Sayward, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 402, 23 Am. Dec. 691 (holding that to take the boots animo furandi from the body of a man found drowned and driven ashore is a felony and that the imputation of such an act is actionable per se); Bash v. Sommer, 20 Pa. St. 159.

21. Alabama.— Kirksey v. Fike, 29 Ala. 206.

Connecticut.— Williams v. Miner, 18 Conn. 464.

Iowa.— McCaleb v. Smith, 22 Iowa 242, holding that it is not actionable to impute acts constituting a trespass only, even though the acts were characterized by the use of the word "stole."

Kansas.— Harrington v. Miles, 11 Kan. 480, 15 Am. Rep. 355, holding that a charge of stealing a dog is not actionable at common law.

Kentucky.— Blackburn v. Clark, 41 S. W. 430, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 659, holding that it is not actionable per se to charge one with "stealing" the door of a house.

Maine.— Wing v. Wing, 66 Me. 62, 22 Am. Rep. 548, holding that the words, "Almon Wing stole windows from Benjamin Jordan's house," are not actionable, as they charge only a trespass upon realty; but that to say Wing "stole Benjamin Jordan's windows" is actionable, as it charges larceny.

Massachusetts.— Carter v. Andrews, 16 Pick. 1.

Mississippi.— Cock v. Weatherby, 5 Sm. & M. 333, holding that it is not actionable to charge one with stealing a "bee tree" as neither wild animals nor standing trees are subject to larceny.

Missouri.—Trimble v. Foster, 87 Mo. 49, 56 Am. Rep. 440, holding that a charge of stealing fixtures is not actionable per se.

New Hampshire.— Norton v. Ladd, 5 N. H. 203, 20 Am. Dec. 573 (holding that a charge of taking a sable out of a trap in the woods is not actionable per se); Blanchard v. Fisk, 2 N. H. 398 (holding that to say of a person that he had stolen a "file of bills" is not actionable where the bills were "unsatisfied accounts."

New Jersey.— Ogden v. Riley, 14 N. J. L. 186, 25 Am. Dec. 513, holding that marl is not a subject of larceny and that to charge one with stealing it is not actionable per se.

New York.— Ayres v. Covill, 18 Barb. 260, holding under a statute making any record paper or proceeding in a court subject to larceny, a charge of stealing a written examination from a magistrate's court is not actionable, unless it appears that the examination was had in a proceeding of which the justice had jurisdiction.

North Carolina.— Idol v. Jones, 13 N. C. 162, holding that the words, "He has stolen my bee tree," are not actionable if a standing tree is meant.

Ohio.— Alfele v. Wright, 17 Ohio St. 238, 93 Am. Dec. 615; Phillips v. Le June, 25 Ohio Cir. Ct. 107.

Pennsylvania.— Stitzell v. Reynolds, 67 Pa. St. 54, 5 Am. Rep. 396 (holding that to charge one with the larceny of standing corn is not actionable per se); Lukehart v. Byerly, 53 Pa. St. 418 (holding that a charge that one has "stolen apples" is not actionable per se without a colloquium, for the words may charge only a trespass); Findlay v. Bear, 8 Serg. & R. 571 (holding that it is not actionable per se to charge one with stealing a dog).

Tennessee.— Rodgers v. Rodgers, 11 Heisk. 757.

England.— Lemon v. Simmons, 57 L. J. Q. B. 260, 36 Wkly. Rep. 351.

See 32 Cent. Dig. tit. "Libel and Slander," § 52.

22. Illinois.— Halsey v. Stillman, 48 Ill. App. 413, holding that, under a statute making anything which is parcel of the realty subject to larceny, it is actionable per se to accuse another of stealing screen doors off a house.

Indiana.— Hoskins v. Tarrence, 5 Blackf. 417, 35 Am. Dec. 129, holding that it is actionable per se to charge one with stealing a key, although in a lock of a door in a house, as it is "personal goods."

Kansas.— Harrington v. Miles, 11 Kan. 480, 15 Am. Rep. 355, holding that it is actionable per se to charge one with stealing a dog, as under statute such act is larceny.

Maryland.— Fawsett v. Clark, 48 Md. 494, 30 Am. Rep. 481.

Massachusetts.— Dunnell v. Fiske, 11 Metc. 551, holding that it is actionable per se to charge one with stealing "patterns," if by the charge is meant material forms used for moldings; but that it is not actionable, if the theft of an invention or mere knowledge of the patterns is meant.

New York.— Collyer v. Collyer, 50 Hun 422, 3 N. Y. Suppl. 310; Phillips v. Barber, 7 Wend. 439 (holding that the words, "You have stolen my wood," are actionable per se when unqualified); Dexter v. Taber, 12 Johns. 239 (a charge of stealing standing timber is not actionable per se, but that it is otherwise as to a charge of stealing timber already cut).

(D) Charge of Larceny Against Joint Owner. It is not actionable per se to charge a joint owner[23] or a partner[24] with taking property held under joint ownership. But if, when the words imputing theft of the property of which plaintiff was a joint owner are spoken, no allusion was made to any joint ownership of the property and it did not appear that the persons addressed knew or believed such to be its condition, the charge is slanderous per se.[25]

(E) Particular Epithets — (1) "THIEF" AND DERIVATIVES. The word "thief," if not explained, will be presumed to impute crime,[26] and hence it may be laid down as a general rule that to call one a thief is prima facie actionable per se,[27] even though the term is used with reference to no particular transaction,

Vermont.— Darling v. Clement, 69 Vt. 292, 37 Atl. 779 (holding that it is actionable per se to charge one with stealing lumber, although the words were so used as to show that by lumber was meant wood taken from defendant's land); Redway v. Gray, 31 Vt. 292 (holding that a charge of stealing hay is actionable per se).

See 32 Cent. Dig. tit. "Libel and Slander," § 52.

Horse stealing.— It is slanderous per se to charge one with horse stealing. Smith v. Burrus, 1066 Mo. 94, 16 S. W. 881, 27 Am. St. Rep. 329, 13 L. R. A. 59; Bell v. McGinness, 40 Ohio St. 204, 48 Am. Rep. 673 (holding that to say of one, "He stole the horse without a doubt; there is so much evidence against him that it will convict him," is actionable per se); Shadden v. McElwee, 86 Tenn. 146, 5 S. W. 602, 6 Am. St. Rep. 821; Dillard v. Collins, 25 Gratt. (Va.) 343. So to charge one with belonging to a gang of horse thieves is actionable per se. Quinn v. Scott, 22 Minn. 456.

23. Alabama.— Kirksey v. Fike, 29 Ala. 206, holding that it is not actionable per se to say of a joint owner of property, "He is mighty smart after night," and, "Put him in the dark, and he would get it all."

Massachusetts.— Carter v. Andrews, 16 Pick. 1.

Ohio.— Phillips v. Le June, 25 Ohio Cir. Ct. 107, holding that it is not actionable per se to charge a joint tenant with taking away undivided crops.

Tennessee.— Rodgers v. Rodgers, 11 Heisk. 757, holding that words charging a wife of a joint owner of personal property with selling a portion thereof in her possession are not actionable per se, as a joint tenant cannot be guilty of larceny.

England.— Lemon v. Simmons, 57 L. J. Q. B. 260, 30 Wkly. Rep. 351, holding that it is not actionable per se to charge a husband with robbing his wife while they are living together, sed aliter if they were living apart.

Iowa.— De Moss v. Haycock, 15 Iowa 149, holding that to charge one with "taking without leave" property belonging to defendant is actionable per se if understood by the hearers to charge a crime.

Kentucky.— Jones v. McDowell, 4 Bibb 188, holding that where defendant said of plaintiff that he "saw the appellee take corn from Aaron Rainy's crib twice, and look around to see if any person saw him measuring," the description of the actions of plaintiff clearly showed that defendant meant to charge a felonious taking.

Michigan.— Blount v. Mason, 140 Mich. 1, 103 N. W. 525 (holding that the words, "I saw Fred Blount take wood from off my wood pile, and he has it now on his wagon, and I want you to go with me to the mill, and see it unloaded," are actionable with an averment that they imputed a crime); Hewitt v. Morley, 111 Mich. 187, 69 N. W. 245.

Missouri.— Estes v. Antrobus, 1 Mo. 197, 13 Am. Dec. 496.

New York.— Miller v. Miller, 8 Johns. 74, 77, holding that the words, "My watch has been stolen in Polly Miller's bar room, and I have reason to believe that Tina Miller took it, and that her mother concealed it," are actionable per se.

Ohio.— Reinhardt v. Faschnacht, 4 Ohio Cir. Ct. 321, 2 Ohio Cir. Dec. 571, holding that to say of one, "Your cousin Faschnacht took my ring; she had better bring it back." "I can have her put in the county jail," is actionable.

Pennsylvania.— Dottarer v. Bushey, 16 Pa. St. 204 (where the words were, "He took my wood and is guilty of any and every thing that is dishonest"); Shultz v. Chambers, 8 Watts 300; Bornman v. Boyer, 3 Binn. 515, 5 Am. Dec. 380 (holding that the following words: "I have lost a calfskin out of my cellar the day that you and Bornman got the leather." "I do not blame you nor Gray, but Bornman must have taken it," were words actionable per se).

South Carolina.— Galloway v. Courtney, 10 Rich. 414 (holding that the words, "It was Robert Galloway who broke into his sister's house, and took the money," are actionable as charging larceny); Jones v. Rivers, 3 Brev. 95 (to charge that one on pretense of being a preacher inveigled negroes and took them off is actionable per se).

Tennessee.— Hancock v. Stephens, 11 Humphr. 507; Watson v. Nicholas, 6 Humphr. 174, holding that where plaintiff said to defendant, "Did you not say it was not the first pig I had taken that was not my own," and defendant answered, "I did say it, and say it yet," the words were actionable per se.

Virginia.— Hook v. Hancock, 5 Munf. 546, holding that it is actionable to say of another, "Hancock has taken my slave, and I will have him sent to the penitentiary for it."

See 32 Cent. Dig. tit. "Libel and Slander," § 48.

45. Slayton v. Hemken, 91 Hun (N. Y.) 582, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 249; Shultz v. Chambers, 8 Watts (Pa.) 300; Jones v. Rivers, 3 Brev. (S. C.) 95, holding that to charge one with robbing another's medicine chest is actionable per se.

Imputations of robbery see infra, III, D, 11, b. (XXII).

been held to import a charge of larceny and to be actionable per se.[46] But it has been held that the common and ordinary meaning of the word "hook" is not to "steal," and that the term is not of itself actionable per se.[47] So it has been held that saying that a library has been "plundered" is not equivalent to saying that books had been stolen from it, and is not actionable per se.[48]

(6) "ROGUE" OR "RASCAL." Although calling one a "rogue" or a "rascal" is not in itself slanderous,[49] yet such terms may be so used in connection with other defamatory words as to render them actionable.[50]

(XIX) LIBEL. Oral words charging another with publishing a libel have been held to be slanderous per se as imputing a criminal offense.[51]

(XX) PERJURY OR FALSE SWEARING AND SUBORNATION OF PERJURY— (A) In General. The rule is well supported by numerous well considered authorities that a charge of perjury is actionable per se,[52] perjury being under-

St. 62 [affirming 6 Phila. 391] (holding that to charge one with the larceny of certain hats, followed by the remark, "You are a rogue," is sufficient after verdict to sustain the action); Morgan v. Livingston, 2 Rich. (S. C.) 573 (holding that the words, "You get your living by sneaking about when other people are asleep," "Where did you get the little wild shoats you have in your pen? You are an infernal roguish rascal," impute larceny and are actionable per se.

the wilful giving under an oath or affirmation, legally imposed, of false testimony material to the issue or point of inquiry.[53]

(B) Form of Imputation — (1) DIRECT CHARGE OF PERJURY. If the charge of perjury is direct and unqualified, it is in itself actionable.[54]

(2) CHARGE OF FALSE SWEARING. Swearing to that which is false does not necessarily imply that the party has in judgment of law perjured himself. It may mean that he has sworn to a falsehood without being conscious at the time that it was a falsehood.[55] Hence words charging that one "swore falsely," "swore to a falsehood," "swore to a lie," or any similar words, are not actionable,[56] unless they are coupled with other words calculated to convey to the mind of the hearer the idea that the falsehood was of the grade which the law punishes as a that such person so called had authority to hold a court known in law or to act judicially and administer an oath.[63]

(D) In Grand Jury Proceedings. A grand jury is a tribunal competent to administer an oath and words imputing false swearing before a grand jury are actionable per se.[64] And where a charge of this character has been made, defendant cannot be relieved from responsibility on the ground that no such judicial proceeding was had or, if had, that the person charged with false swearing was not examined as a witness.[65]

(F) Jurisdiction of Court. Since an accusation of perjury implies within itself everything necessary to constitute the offense,[69] where the words contain a direct charge of perjury or are such as of themselves necessarily import a charge of perjury, it is not necessary to aver and show that the charge related to testimony in an action before a court of competent jurisdiction,[70] as it will be presumed until the contrary appears that the court had jurisdiction of the cause[71] and had power lawfully to administer an oath.[72] When, however, the words charged are not actionable in themselves but are rendered so by reference to extrinsic matters, it is incumbent on plaintiff to allege and show that they were spoken in reference to a proceeding before a court or officer of competent jurisdiction.[73] It is always a defense to show that the words were uttered in reference to testimony given under an oath administered extrajudicially or in a proceeding in which the court or officer was without jurisdiction.[74] The same rule applies to words referring to testimony given under an oath prescribed by an unconstitutional act of the legislature,[75] or to testimony given while not under the obligation of an oath.[76] If, however, the charge relates to a judicial proceeding before a tribunal having jurisdiction over the subject under investigation, it will be no defense that the pleadings in the cause may have been so defective that no reversible judgment could be rendered.[77] So it has been held that it will be no defense to a charge of false swearing in an affidavit or complaint made before a tribunal of competent jurisdiction, for the purpose of procuring a warrant, that the affidavit was insufficient to justify the issuance of a warrant,[78] or that the warrant actually taken out was void for want of a seal.[79] It has also been held that a charge of perjury may be predicated upon testimony given in a proceeding which was not void and coram non judice, although it was erroneous in consequence of an error of judgment on the part of the judicial officer in taking such testimony and acting upon it.[80]

(G) Materiality of Evidence. Since to constitute the offense of perjury a person must swear falsely respecting a fact material to the issue,[81] it may be stated as a general rule that to charge one with false swearing in testifying as a witness on the trial of a cause is not actionable if the evidence charged to be false was not material to the issue involved in the suit in which it was given.[82] It is not necessary, however, to show to what particular degree the point in respect to which the person is charged with false swearing was material to the issue; it is sufficient if it be circumstantially material.[83] Nor is it necessary that the testimony should be so material as to establish the action or defense. It is sufficient if it goes to prove a material circumstance or link in the chain of evidence making out the cause of action or defense.[84] Where the language is in itself actionable as amounting to an accusation of the crime of perjury, without the aid of any colloquia or averments of extrinsic facts, in explanation of the circumstances under which the words were spoken, the materiality of the false testimony will be presumed,[85] at least in the absence of anything to show that it was known or understood to relate to an immaterial matter at the time by those in whose presence the defamatory accusation was made.[86] Indeed there are several decisions to the effect that, although the words are not actionable in themselves, it will be presumed that the testimony of a witness sworn and examined in a judicial proceeding was material and pertinent to the issue;[87] and this, although the charge was not general but was confined to a particular part of the testimony, unless the hearers must necessarily have understood that the testimony charged to have been

Materiality held a question of law.— In an action of slander for charging plaintiff with false swearing in giving his testimony in a cause, where there is no dispute as to the facts sworn to, the question whether the evidence was material to the point in issue is a question of law to be decided by the court, and not of fact to be passed upon by the jury. false was immaterial,[88] it being, however, competent for defendant to rebut this legal presumption.[89] Moreover the broad rule has been laid down that where false testimony is charged against a witness as to any particular matter, and nothing appears at the time to show but that it may have been material to the issue in which it was given; or is otherwise known to the hearer, but is so received and understood by him, in such case defendant will be regarded as designedly imputing perjury; and having once giving the imputation to the world, he cannot subsequently avoid slander by showing that the testimony was immaterial.[90]

(H) Subornation of Perjury. A charge that one is guilty of subornation of perjury is slanderous per se.[91] But words are not actionable as charging subornation of perjury, unless it appears from the colloquium or the words themselves that they had reference to an oath taken in the course of a judicial proceeding.[92]

88. Wilbur v. Ostrom, 1 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 275; Power v. Price, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 450 [reversing 12 Wend. 500]. See also Coleman v. Goodwin, 2 B. & C. 285 note, 9 E. C. L. 131; 3 Dougl. 91, 26 E. C. L. 69. Compare Crookshank v. Gray, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 344; Smith v. Smith, 30 N. C. 29, holding that where the words do not directly import a charge of perjury but only that plaintiff was foresworn and defendant had, in speaking the words, gone on to specify the matters testified by plaintiff and the point in which he had sworn falsely, then it would be incumbent on plaintiff to set forth the whole truth in his declaration, and if upon the whole thus stated and proved the matter to which the alleged false oath related appeared to be immaterial, action could not be maintained.

90. Butterfield v. Buffum, 9 N. H. 156.

91. Beers v. Strong, Kirby (Conn.) 12; Shimer v. Bronnenburg, 18 Ind. 363 (holding that the words, "Pete Farnot swore to a lie, and you (the plaintiff meaning) hired him," are actionable as imputing subornation of perjury when properly averred); Avery v. Ward, 150 Mass. 160, 22 N. E. 707.

92. Power v. Miller, 2 McCord (S. C.) 220.

93. Furr v. Speed, 74 Miss. 423, 21 So. 562 (holding that the words, "Mrs. Furr poisoned me," are actionable per se); Liles v. Gaster, 42 Ohio St. 631; Eckart v. Wilson, 10 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 44 (holding that the words, "You have poisoned him, and I can prove it," are actionable); Campbell v. Campbell, 54 Wis. 90, 11 N. W. 456 (where the charge was that plaintiff was "slow poisoning her husband").

94. Mills v. Wimp, 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 417, "holding that the charge, "She put poison in a barrel of drinking water to poison me," is actionable per se. Compare Rock v. McClarnon, 95 Ind. 415.

95. Illinois.— Tottleben v. Blankenship, 58 Ill. App. 47.

Iowa.— Burton v. Burton, 3 Greene 316, a charge of poisoning defendant's cow.

Kentucky.— Lemons v. Wells, 78 Ky. 117, holding that to say of another, "He knew that Lemons poisoned his mare Alice and that he would have him arrested, on suspicion, for poisoning his mare," is actionable per se.

Maryland.— Yearly v. Ashley, 4 Harr. & J. 314, holding that the words, "Isaiah Ashley cut my horses' throats," are actionable.

Michigan.— Vickers v. Stoneman, 73 Mich. 419, 41 N. W. 495, holding that it is actionable to charge a person with poisoning the cattle of another, the poisoning resulting in the death of the cattle.

New York.— See Baxter v. Mohr, 37 Misc. 833, 76 N. Y. Suppl. 982.

South Carolina.— Gage v. Shelton, 3 Rich. 242, holding that it is actionable per se to charge one with killing a horse.

Vermont.— Hutchinson v. Wheeler, 35 Vt. 330, a charge of poisoning a cow.

See 32 Cent. Dig. tit. "Libel and Slander," § 62.

96. Chaplin v. Cruikshanks, 2 Harr. & J. (Md.) 247 (holding that it is not actionable to charge one with poisoning the horse of another, as it does not charge an indictable offense in the absence of evidence to show that the horse died); Glines v. Smith, 48 N. H. 259 (holding that to charge another "with wilfully and maliciously poisoning a horse" does not charge a crime under statute); Sturgenegger v. Taylor, 2 Brev. (S. C.) 480 (holding that the words, "Those two rascals killed my hogs," are not slanderous per se).

97. Dudley v. Nowill, 11 N. Y. App. Div.

(XXIV) RECEIVING STOLEN PROPERTY. An oral charge of criminally receiving stolen property is actionable per se.[98] But the words must impute criminal intention.[99]

(XXV) REMOVING LANDMARKS. Where the removing of landmarks is recognized as an indictable crime, oral words charging such removal are actionable per se.[1]

(XXVI) ROBBERY. It is slanderous per se to charge one with robbery.[2] The word "robber" is not actionable unless defendant intended to impute crime, which, however, the law will presume if not explained.[3] Words charging a person with being a "robber" or with having "robbed" may be so qualified as not to be actionable per se.[4] Thus a charge of "robbing a town" is not actionable, since the crime cannot be committed against a town.[5] A charge of a mere attempt to rob is not actionable per se,[6] unless such attempt in itself constitutes a crime.[7]

(XXVII) VIOLATION OF ELECTION LAWS. A charge of fraudulently destroying a vote,[8] or wilfully making a false declaration of one's right to vote,[9] or of fraudulently miscounting votes,[10] has been held to be actionable per se.

203, 42 N. Y. Suppl. 681 (holding that it is actionable per se as charging rape to say of one that "he is the father of a child by a young girl not yet fifteen years old"); Lally v. Emery, 59 Hun (N. Y.) 237, 12 N. Y. Suppl. 785; Pallet v. Sargent, 36 N. H. 496; Williams v. McKee, 98 Tenn. 139, 38 S. W. 730.

4. Macauley v. Elrod, 27 S. W. 867, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 291 (holding that a charge that plaintiff "beat Boulier out of one thousand dollars when he worked for Boulier . . . He robbed you, Boulier, of a thousand dollars when he worked for you" does not charge a crime); Allen v. Hillman, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 101; Ritchie v. Stenius, 73 Mich. 563, 41 N. W. 687; Filber v. Dautermann, 28 Wis. 134 (holding that the words, "You have cheated and robbed orphan children," shown by the complaint to have been used to charge that plaintiff had secured the assignment of some mortgages by fraud, are not actionable per se).

To call one a "bushwhacker" does not impute robbery. Curry v. Collins, 37 Mo. 324.

A charge of double voting at a town meeting on a question of opinion merely and one which the meeting had no power to determine has been held not to be actionable per se. Shepherd v. Piper, 98 Me. 384, 57 Atl. 84.

10. Ellsworth v. Hayes, 71 Wis. 427, 37 N. W. 249.

(XXVIII) CRIMES RELATING TO UNITED STATES MAIL. To charge one orally with robbing the United States mail,[11] or with sending obscene matter through the mails,[12] or to charge a postmaster with embezzling letters,[13] is slanderous per se. But it is not slanderous per se to charge one with breaking open and reading a letter, as that is not an offense involving moral turpitude or subjecting one to infamous punishment.[14]

(XXIV) MISCELLANEOUS CRIMES. Words charging a person with being an anarchist,[15] or imputing malicious trespass or destruction of property,[16] public indecency,[17] vagrancy,[18] drunkenness,[19] seduction,[20] or charging one with disturbing a religious meeting,[21] disposing of mortgaged property,[22] or with producing a false and pretended heir for the purpose of intercepting the inheritance of property,[23] have been held to be actionable per se as charging the commission of a criminal offense. But a charge of burning, destroying, and suppressing a will,[24] or of being a "white capper,"[25] is not actionable as imputing crime.

E. Imputations of Unchastity or Immorality — 1. IN LIBELOUS FORM — a. In General. A written or printed charge of unchastity or immorality is actionable per se, since it tends to blacken the reputation and to expose one to public contempt.[26] It is not necessary that the charge of unchastity be direct, but

27. Illinois.— Spolek Denni Hlasatel v. Hoffman, 204 Ill. 532, 68 N. E. 400 [affirming 105 Ill. App. 170] (a publication charging that a woman sought elsewhere a substitute for her husband); Jacksonville Journal Co. v. Beymer, 42 Ill. App. 443 (a publication concerning a married woman, stating that she had "run off with another fellow").

Indiana.— Indianapolis Journal Newspaper Co. v. Pugh, 6 Ind. App. 510, 33 N. E. 991, holding that it is libelous to charge a woman with having traveled with a man, not her husband, with having been turned out of a hotel, and that the transaction had caused a sensation in the community where it transpired.

Massachusetts.— Goodrich v. Davis, 11 Metc. 473, a publication charging plaintiff with a violation of the seventh commandment.

Michigan.— Thibault v. Sessions, 101 Mich. 279, 59 N. W. 624 (an article entitled, "Teachers Guilty of Horrible Crimes," and imputing that they had taken criminal liberties with some of their pupils); Bailey v. Kalamazoo Pub. Co., 40 Mich. 251 (holding that the words, "There was that Iowa Beecher business of his, which beat him out of a station at Grass Lake," will support an innuendo charging adultery).

New York.— Stafford v. Morning Journal Assoc., 142 N. Y. 598, 37 N. E. 625 [affirming 68 Hun 467, 22 N. Y. Suppl. 1008] (holding that the words, "Le Huray Sisters, Blanche, Stella and Allien, just from Paris; massage, French style; Love secrets; how to get a husband; Inclose stamp; valuable information for ladies by aid of cards," published in the advertising columns of a newspaper under the heading, "Astrology," are libelous); O'Brien v. Bennett, 72 N. Y. App. Div. 367, 76 N. Y. Suppl. 498 (a publication charging in a spectacular manner that plaintiff had been arrested at a public resort with a married woman); Mooney v. New York News Pub. Co., 48 N. Y. App. Div. 271, 62 N. Y. Suppl. 781 (holding that to charge a woman with living with a man as his wife, although not married to him, is libelous per se); Mooney v. Bennett, 44 N. Y. App. Div. 423, 60 N. Y. Suppl. 1103 (holding that a publication that M had lived with plaintiff who called herself Mrs. M, and that her relatives denied her claim to the title, and alluding to her as the alleged Mrs. M, is libelous).

Ohio.— Steen v. Friend, 20 Ohio Cir. Ct. 459, 11 Ohio Cir. Dec. 235, holding that a letter to a young woman's father stating, "I will write Concerning Laurie. I wish you would Come out here and take her home as she has caused me a great deal of trouble so much so that She has separated Me and my husband and she is still Staying with him Alone. Please come at once. My husband has treated me shamefully through her And driven me and my Children away from home For her sake," is libelous per se.

United States.— Broad v. Deuster, 4 Fed. Cas. No. 1,908, 8 Biss. 265, holding that to publish of a man that "there are suits pending against him to the effect that he has put himself in unlawful relations with the wives of other men" is libelous per se.

See 32 Cent. Dig. tit. "Libel and Slander," § 71 et seq.

Words not libelous per se.— Stockman v. Western Union Tel. Co., (Kan. App. 1900) 63 Pac. 658 (holding that a telegraph message sent by a husband to his wife who was suing him for a divorce, requesting her not to study "ology" (meaning the female sexual organs) too hard. "No witnesses will appear," was not libelous per se, and that the telegraph company was not liable, since it had no right to assume that the words meant something not apparent on their face); Fields v. Curd, (Ky. 1891) 16 S. W. 453 (holding the words, "I like you and want to tell you so. If you like me, I want to know it. Let us be friends, and good friends. Answer this," written by a man to a married woman,

b. Incest. A publication in writing, imputing incest, is actionable per se.[28]

c. Keeping House of Ill Fame. A written charge of keeping a house of ill fame is actionable per se.[29]

2. In Slanderous Form — a. In General. As a general rule at common law spoken words are not actionable as in themselves imputing unchastity or immorality, or by reason of the existence of extraneous facts and circumstances tending to prove that they were spoken for the purpose of imputing a want of chastity, because unchastity as a subject of ecclesiastical cognizance was not punishable in common-law courts.[30] In some jurisdictions, however, apart from statute, an oral charge of unchastity in a woman is actionable per se.[31] Moreover, in most jurisdictions in this country oral language charging unchastity may now be actionable per se, either as the direct result of statutes expressly to this effect,[32] or are not libelous as they contain no imputations upon the character of the recipient of the letter); Sickles v. Kling, 60 N. Y. App. Div. 515, 69 N. Y. Suppl. 944 (holding that to write of a woman that "she became Allen's agent while they were related together in the city of New York, since which time she has formed a new relationship with one Sickles," is not libelous). A charge that plaintiff had "intercourse" with a person of the opposite sex is not actionable (Huddleson v. Swope, 71 Ind. 430; Merritt v. Dearth, 48 Vt. 65), unless the word "intercourse" is so used as to show that criminal or sexual intercourse is meant (Elam v. Badger, 23 Ill. 498; Adams v. Rankin, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 58).

36. Page v. Merwin, 54 Conn. 426, 8 Atl. 675 (holding that where defendant in speaking of an unmarried woman who had recently given birth to a child said, "Page (meaning the plaintiff) is the father of the child," the words are actionable as charging a crime); Lovejoy v. Whitcomb, 174 Mass. 586, 55 N. E. 322 (holding that where the words alleged were, "What a pity we have got such a man for a director. His moral character is not good. You must have heard about his being caught with the house girl. I have got proof enough. I have been looking around and I know it's so. He is vile," while the word "caught" did not necessarily imply the commission of an offense, yet with the accompanying expressions it implies adultery); Birch v. Benton, 26 Mo. 153 (holding that it is actionable to charge a man "with keeping his own negro wench"); Beirer v. Bushfield, 1 Watts (Pa.) 23 (holding that the words, "He was guilty with a woman, for he went to bed with Mrs. Kislar, and stroked her," are actionable); Walton v. Singleton, 7 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 449, 10 Am. Dec. 472 (charging a married man with "fornication"); Brown v. Lamberton, 2 Binn. (Pa.) 34 (charging that a married man played in a fodder room with a married woman, not his wife, and that children of hers belonged to him).

Words held not actionable. — Nidever v. Hall, 67 Cal. 79, 7 Pac. 136 (holding that upon women.[37] The fact that the charge of unchastity is expressed in words too words charging that another virtually acknowledged he had sexual intercourse with a woman named not his wife do not charge that he was actually guilty but that he acknowledged himself guilty and hence are not actionable); Dickey v. Andros, 32 Vt. 55 (holding that where defendant in a conversation about plaintiff said, "I saw Dickey here on Friday night. I saw him and heard him and can swear to it. He was not here for any good design. I will break up the haunt if I can possibly do it," the words do not charge adultery and are not actionable).

37. California.—Hitchcock v. Caruthers, 82 Cal. 523, 23 Pac. 48 (holding that where defendant said that a certain man "was cohabiting with plaintiff as his mistress;" that "he was keeping the girl for immoral purposes," and that he "was using Ida as his mistress," the words are actionable per se); Kedrolivansky v. Niebaum, 70 Cal. 216, 11 Pac. 641 (holding that where defendant said "that said plaintiff was a bad woman, and that you had better have nothing to do with her case, as it is a very bad one; that she . . . had not lived with her husband for two years previous to his death, and that she . . . was the cause of her husband's death; that she had driven him . . . to drinking, and that her husband fell while drunk, and was killed," the words are actionable as charging adultery); McKinney v. Roberts, 68 Cal. 192, 8 Pac. 857 (holding that to say of a married woman that she is a paramour of a man not her husband is actionable per se).

Illinois.— Iles v. Swank, 202 Ill. 453, 66 N. E. 1042, 105 Ill. App. 9, holding that the words, "She keeps a public house; I could do business with her if I wanted to; have seen lots of that going on there," when properly averred, are actionable as charging adultery.

Indiana.— Waugh v. Waugh, 47 Ind. 580 (holding that it is actionable to say to a married woman, "You have taken men into your bedroom"); Rodgers v. Lacey, 23 Ind. 507 (holding that the words, "It was no doubt but that George Howk was as intimate with Mrs. Lacey . . . as with his own wife. That he . . . could prove by three witnesses that George Howk came out of the bed-room, where Mrs. Lacey . . . was, with his trowsers down," are actionable); Proctor v. Owens, 18 Ind. 21, 81 Am. Dec. 341 (holding that where defendant said of plaintiff that "Baden saw or told him that . . . he either scared or drove Jane Owens and a man supposed to be Jo. Dearmond up from behind a log; . . . that they broke and run, and that he (Baden) got her parasol and handkerchief, and if any body did not believe him he could come and see them," the words are actionable as charging adultery); Guard v. Risk, 11 Ind. 156 (holding that to say that an unmarried woman slept with a man two nights imputes fornication and is actionable); Shields v. Cunningham, 1 Blackf. 86 (holding that the words, "Dr. Eddy made an appointment with Elizabeth Cunningham, (meaning the plaintiff) scaled the walls and went to bed to her," are actionable as charging fornication).

Kentucky.— Lyons v. Stratton, 102 Ky. 317, 43 S. W. 446, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1343 (holdthat the words, "She is set up for the winter," when properly averred, are actionable); Morris v. Curtis, 45 S. W. 86, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 56 (holding that it is actionable for defendant to say that when he passed plaintiff and another he saw the latter get off plaintiff, who put her clothes down).

Maine.— True v. Plumley, 36 Me. 466, holding that to say of a woman that "she is a damned whore, or she would not ride with J. B." is sufficient to charge her with adultery.

Michigan.— Derham v. Derham, 123 Mich. 451, 82 N. W. 218, holding that to say that plaintiff's grandfather was a woman's man and that plaintiff was just like him, that her mother was like the grandfather and that plaintiff was no better is actionable per se.

Missouri.—Kersting v. White, 107 Mo. App. 265, 80 S. W. 730, holding that where plaintiff was keeping house for Elms and defendant said Elms and his housekeeper were "living in sin together," the words are actionable as imputing unchastity to plaintiff.

New Hampshire.— Sturtevant v. Root, 27 N. H. 69, holding that to say that a married woman went into a bedroom with a man not her husband is actionable as imputing adultery.

New York.— Ronnie v. Ryder, 8 N. Y. Suppl. 5 (holding that the court will not disturb a verdict for plaintiff where the words charged were, "She is a dangerous woman, and inclined for men"); Mason v. Stratton, 1 N. Y. Suppl. 511.

North Carolina.— Sowers v. Sowers, 87 N. Vermont.— Sheridan v. Sheridan, 58 Vt. 504, 5 Atl. 494, holding that the words, "Ask your mother . . . when she had the double-shotted children . . . what strange bull . . . came along," when spoken of a married woman who had given birth to twins, are actionable as imputing the crime of adultery.

See 32 Cent. Dig. tit. "Libel and Slander," §§ 71–78.

Words not actionable per se.— Illinois.— Koch v. Heideman, 16 Ill. App. 478, holding that to say of a married woman, "She has been laying on the lounge with a male boarder," does not charge adultery.

Indiana.— Funk v. Beverly, 112 Ind. 190, 13 N. E. 573 (holding that the words, "I know all about that case; while she was out there claiming to be the wife of George H. Funk, she was back here claiming to be my wife," is not actionable as imputing want of chastity); Ward v. Colyhan, 30 Ind. 395 (holding that the words, "He went to see her for that purpose," without further averments, are not actionable).

Massachusetts.— Adams v. Stone, 131 Mass. 433 (holding that the words, "Mr. Harvey Adams was intimate with his brother's wife for a number of years," do not charge adultery and are not actionable); York v. Johnson, 116 Mass. 482 (holding that where defendant said of plaintiff, "I was speaking to a certain lady about . . . Mrs. Yorks case . . . and I said, what should you think of a lady who belongs to the . . . church . . . if she should give the pox to a married man and he should give it to his wife," and plaintiff alleged that defendant meant that she had a loathsome disease and had given it to a married man, the words are not actionable as they do not support the innuendo).

Minnesota.— Radke v. Kolbe, 79 Minn. 440, 82 N. W. 977, holding that the words, "Mr. Radke had to work awful hard on the section every day, and his woman went some nights with other men folks. She is a dirty sow," are not actionable as imputing want of chastity to the wife.

Missouri.— Adams v. Hannon, 3 Mo. 222 (holding that to say of a woman, "I stroked her," is not actionable per se); Walker v. Hoeffner, 54 Mo. App. 554 (holding that where plaintiff said that defendant had put her husband in a hospital and made ten dollars a week out of her boarders in a dishonest way, the words do not charge unchastity, without proof of the sense in which the language was understood.

New York.— Hemmens v. Nelson, 138 N. Y. 517, 34 N. E. 342, 20 L. R. A. 440 (holding that to say of a woman "that she was in the habit of entertaining gentlemen callers at all hours of the night" is not actionable as charging unchastity); Anonymous, 60 N. Y. 262, 19 Am. Rep. 174 (holding that words charging a female with self-pollution are not actionable); McMahon v. Hallock, 1 N. Y. Suppl. 312 (holding that the words, "Go over to my office. My wife and her mother are particular what company they keep. They do not wish to be annoyed by such characters as you," are not slanderous as they do not impute want of chastity).

North Carolina.— Lucas v. Nichols, 52 N. C. 32, holding that words imputing to a woman a wanton and lascivious disposition only are not actionable. See also Snow v. Witcher, 31 N. C. 346.

Texas.— Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, 81 Tex. 479, 17 S. W. 133, holding that the words, "Are you . . . acquainted with Mrs. W——, who was formerly connected with the Sunny South? If so, where is she now, and do you not think she is a charming lady?" with an allegation that Mrs. Wright was of bad repute, do not impute a want of chastity.

Vermont.— Ryan v. Madden, 12 Vt. 51, holding that where defendant said of a married woman that what he had done to her would send them both to state's prison, the words do not impute to her the crime of adultery.

Wisconsin.— Clute v. Clute, 101 Wis. 137, 76 N. W. 1114 (holding that the words, "You matched him in the berry patch," are not actionable per se); Benz v. Wiedehoeft, 83 Wis. 397, 53 N. W. 686 (holding that the words, "The whip was used in the barn. There was some monkey work going on there. I will tell you who it was some other time," followed in another discourse by the words, "It was Lizzie Benz and Willie Drott that was caught in the barn in the crib," are not actionable); K. v. H., 20 Wis. 239, 91 Am. Dec. 397 (holding that words charging a married woman with having seated herself upon the lap of a man other than her husband and desiring him to have carnal intercourse with her do not charge adultery and are not actionable per se).

See 32 Cent. Dig. tit. "Libel and Slander," § 71 et seq.

"Keep" or "kept."— While the words "keep" and "kept" have several meanings, depending on the context of which they form a part, or the circumstances under which they are used (Downing v. Wilson, 36 Ala. 717; McBrayer v. Hill, 26 N. C. 136), yet when it is said in reference to a female that a certain man keeps her, the ordinary and popular interpretation of the expression is that the relation between the parties is one which involves illicit intercourse (Downing v. Wilson, supra; McBrayer v. Hill, supra), and the words are actionable as involving a charge of want of chastity (Downing v. Wilson, supra; McBrayer v. Hill, supra), especially where spoken in connection with other language or under circumstances indicating that this meaning was intended (Huddleson v. Swope, 71 Ind. 430; Kenney v. McLaughlin, 5 Gray (Mass.) 3, 66 Am. Dec. 345; Zeliff v. Jennings, 61 Tex. 458; Stewart v. Major, 17 Wash. 238, 49 Pac. 503). But words charging that a married woman keeps some man being actionable per se, if the words are well understood and commonly used to convey such imputation.[38]

(II) Particular Epithets. It is not actionable merely to call a woman a "bitch" or a "slut," such words not of themselves imputing a breach of chastity,[39] although if they are used under such circumstances or in such connection as to show that they were intended and understood to mean an imputation of whoredom they may be actionable.[40] Where words imputing to a woman want of chastity are actionable per se as charging slander, a charge that a woman is a "whore," is actionable,[41] unless the word was uttered with such explanatory statements, or other than her husband are of doubtful import; and whether they were spoken by the speaker, and understood by the hearers, as charging the crime of adultery, or a mere ordinary employment of help, is a question of fact to be settled by a jury. Henicke v. Griffith, 29 Kan. 516.

in connection with such facts as make it clear that it was neither used by the speaker nor taken by the listeners in its actionable sense.[42] The same rule applies to the use of the terms "prostitute,"[43] and "strumpet."[44] The word "bawd" applied to a woman is not actionable per se as imputing unchastity, since a bawd is one who procures opportunities for persons of opposite sexes to cohabit in an unlawful manner.[45] Nor is it actionable per se to charge a woman with being "base" and "lewd,"[46] or "ornery";[47] or to say of her that she is a "bad woman," a woman of "ill repute," or not a "decent woman," or to use other words of similar import,[48] unless the words are spoken in such connection with other words or under such circumstances as will impute want of chastity.[49]

(III) Charge of Pregnancy or Birth of Illegitimate Child. It has been held that a charge that an unmarried woman is pregnant or that such a woman[50]

Charge of being inmate of whore-house.— The words, "Eliza Perrin was one week in Lafayette in a whore-house," are actionable as charging whoredom. Blickenstaff v. Perrin, 27 Ind. 527. But to say of a woman, "She has gone down the river with two whores to the 'Goose Horn' at St. Louis and is now there with them," is not actionable without a colloquium as to the kind of place alluded to. Indiana.— Kern v. Bridwell, 119 Ind. 226, 21 N. E. 664, 12 Am. St. Rep. 409; Emmerson v. Marvel, 55 Ind. 265 (holding that the words spoken of an unmarried woman, "She was getting fat, some one had slipped up on the blind side of her," while not ordinarily actionable per se, may be made so by proper averments that the words were understood to import pregnancy); Acker v. McCullough, 50 Ind. 447; Wilson v. Barnett, 45 Ind. 163 (holding that where defendant said, "Irvin Barnard was going to run away on account of Josephine (plaintiff meaning) being in a bad fix, and that a certain woman had got medicine of a doctor and that she had . . . become all right," and the words were alleged to mean that plaintiff, an unmarried female, had been pregnant, the charge is actionable per se); Miles v. Vanhorn, 17 Ind. 245, 79 Am. Dec. 477 (holding that the words, "She is in the family way, and I . . . can prove by Bob Thompson that she . . . has been taking camphor and opium pills to produce an abortion," when spoken of an unmarried woman are actionable); Hibner v. Fleetwood, 19 Ind. App. 421, 49 N. E. 607; Cosand v. Lee, 11 Ind. App. 511, 38 N. E. 1099 (holding that to say of an unmarried woman, "You want to come home, and have another young one, like you did last summer," is actionable as charging fornication).

has given birth to a child[51] is actionable per se as amounting to a charge of fornication. So a charge that a married woman has given birth to a bastard child is actionable as charging adultery.[52] To say of a married woman that she is pregnant[53] or has a child[54] is not actionable per se.

c. Bestiality or Sodomy. Whether words charging sodomy or bestiality are actionable per se[55] or not[56] depends as a general rule on the question whether the jurisdiction is one in which the act charged is recognized as a common-law, or statutory offense. In one jurisdiction, however, where sodomy or bestiality was not criminally punishable, a charge imputing to a woman an act of this character was held actionable on the ground that it was an imputation of unchastity.[57]

Maine.— Patterson v. Wilkinson, 55 Me. 42. 92 Am. Dec. 568, holding that the words, "Malvina (meaning the plaintiff) has been to swear a young one," are actionable.

Charging man with bastardy.— In Erwin v. Dezell, 64 Hun (N. Y.) 391, 19 N. Y. Suppl. 784, it was held that bastardy is not a crime in New York and that words charging that a man had been arrested for bastardy are not actionable per se.

52. Hammond v. Stewart, 72 Ill. App. 512; Maxwell v. Allison, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 343; Hoar v. Ward, 47 Vt. 657. Compare Patterson v. Edwards, 7 Ill. 720, holding that the words, "Mrs. Edwards has raised a family of children by a negro," are not sufficient in themselves to charge adultery and are not actionable.

Necessity of averment or colloquium.— The mother of a person charged with being a bastard cannot maintain an action of slander for the words as imputing want of chastity to the mother in the absence of an averment or colloquium connecting the charge with plaintiff (Maxwell v. Allison, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 343), and stating definitely the crime intended to be imputed (Hoar v. Ward, 47 Vt. 657).

53. Acker v. McCullough, 50 Ind. 447.

54. Wilson v. Beighler, 4 Iowa 427, holding that the words, "She had a child," without any averment that the party about whom the words were spoken was unmarried or that the hearers understood the words to impute want of chastity, are not actionable.

55. Indiana.—Ausman v. Veal, 10 Ind. 355, 71 Am. Dec. 331 (holding that the words, "She had two pups," with an innuendo of bestiality are actionable per se, and it is no defense that it is impossible for a woman to have connection with a dog or to have pups by him, as it is popularly believed to be possible, and injury results to plaintiff from the degree of credit given the words and not from the actual scientific facts); Harper v. Delp, 3 Ind. 225 (holding that to say of a man that he "ravished a cow" is actionable per se, but to say that "he had been caught foul of a cow" is not actionable without additional averments).

Missouri.— Edgar v. McCutchen, 9 Mo. 768.

d. Incest. Incest is not a common-law crime, and hence spoken words charging such act, although imputing unchastity in its most detestable form, are not actionable per se,[58] except in jurisdictions where incest is made a statutory offense.[59]

e. Keeping House of Ill Fame. An oral charge of keeping a house of prostitution is actionable per se.[60] The term "bad house" does not necessarily imply a bawdy house, and charging a person with keeping a "bad house" is not in itself actionable.[61] But the term when construed in connection with other words may impute the crime of keeping a bawdy house and thus be actionable per se.[62] So other words, innocent in themselves, may be used to charge the keeping of a house of ill fame.[63]

F. Imputation of Venereal or Contagious Disease — 1. Libelous Words. To falsely charge one in writing with having any repulsive disease or condition which would necessarily cause him to be shunned or avoided is libelous per se.[64]

2. Slanderous Words. So the general rule is laid down that to charge one orally with a disease which would wholly or partially exclude him from society is actionable per se,[65] this being an exception to the rule that the words must contain an imputation of some criminal offense for which corporal punishment may be inflicted.[66] This principle has been applied to venereal disorders,[67] leprosy,[68] and the plague.[69] But an action for oral slander in charging plaintiff with disease has been confined to the imputation of such loathsome and infectious maladies as would make him an object of disgust and aversion, and banish him from human society; and it has been asserted that the foregoing are the only examples which the adjudged cases furnish.[70] Charging another with having had a disease is not actionable unless the words impute a continuance of the disorder at the time of speaking them.[71]

G. Imputations Affecting One in His Profession or Business — 1. In General. It may be stated as a general rule that published words, whether written or oral, are actionable if they directly tend to the prejudice or injury of any one in his profession, trade, or business.[72] The actionable character of the charge lies in the fact that it injures the party in his business or profession, and hence it is not necessary that the words should contain an imputation upon plaintiff as an individual which would be actionable apart from the question of his business or profession.[73] Indeed it has been held that an imputation, when false and when made for the express purpose of injuring plaintiff in his profession, and when such injury actually follows as the probable and natural result of the speaking of the words, will support an action, even though the words have no meaning which strictly speaking could be called defamatory, although it may not be technically an action for slander, if the words are not defamatory.[74] Words not actionable in themselves are not actionable when spoken of one in a profession or trade unless they touch him in his profession or business;[75] that is, they must

Kentucky.— Hargan v. Purdy, 93 Ky. 424, 20 S. W. 432, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 383, holding that where a physician has no authority to practise his profession in the state, he cannot maintain an action for words spoken or written of him in that profession, as he cannot crime, recovery may be had.[83] So a person does not necessarily forfeit all legal claim to protection against defamatory matter affecting his character because he has been guilty of a single illegal act, and hence unless the matters set forth in a declaration are of a nature which indicates that plaintiff's acts and conduct in connection therewith necessarily involve moral turpitude or might fairly be held to affect his general character in any particular, a publication which held plaintiff up to contempt and reproach, as wanting in integrity or otherwise culpable in his general conduct or character, would be actionable, although it might also relate to plaintiff's participation in an illegal transaction.[84] Accordingly it has been held that, although plaintiff, acting on certain facts and in conformity to what he supposed to be the law and usage in similar cases, may have committed a violation of law or participated in the illegal act of another, it does not follow that his general character for commercial integrity and fair dealing was thereby forfeited or so far affected that he could not maintain an action for a publication which held him up to the public as wanting in the qualities and characteristics of a merchant of integrity and honor.[85]

4. Particular Occupations and Professions Considered — a. Physicians and Dentists. It may be laid down as a general rule that words imputing to a physician a want of professional skill or knowledge, or negligence or misconduct in his professional capacity, are actionable in themselves on the ground of presumed damage, oral words[86] coming within the application of the rule as well as

be heard to complain that the words have the effect to deter him from violating a penal law.

New York.— Marsh v. Davison, 9 Paige 580, holding that it is not slanderous to charge a person not legally authorized to practise medicine as a profession with having destroyed the life of a patient by mistaken but legal and well meant efforts to save his life. Compare Fry v. Bennett, 28 N. Rep. 922, holding that to say of a merchant who is not a trader in real estate that he made false statements and misrepresented a lot he had traded to defendant is not actionable, as it is not defamatory of him in respect to his trade or employment.

Maryland.— Dicken v. Shepherd, 22 Md. 399.

Massachusetts.— Fay v. Harrington, 176 Mass. 270, 57 N. E. 369, holding that it is not libelous to charge the manager of an opera house with discriminating against the Irish, although quite a large proportion of the readers of the papers are Irish and plaintiff's audiences are partly Irish.

Michigan.— McGraw v. Detroit Free Press Co., 85 Mich. 203, 48 N. W. 500, holding that where plaintiff was the keeper of a stall in a certain market, it is not libelous upon him to publish "the Princess market is not a howling success. At no time were there more than a dozen people in the market on Saturday night."

New York.— Ireland v. McGarvish, 1 Sandf. 155; Verbeck v. Duryea, 36 Misc. 242, 73 N. Y. Suppl. 346; Goll v. Delesderniers, 26 Misc. 549, 57 N. Y. Suppl. 475 (holding that it is not libelous to say of a business man that he has had one or more unsatisfactory fires); Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Ecclesine, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 9 [affirmed in 34 N. Y. Super. Ct. 76, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 385, 42 How. Pr. 201] (holding that a publication stating that the stock-holders of an insurance company are entitled to twenty per cent of the profits besides an interest divided on the capital is not libelous).

actionable per se.[22] So where two or more persons have been engaged in business together or have had business relations with each other, a notice by one of such parties announcing the dissolution or cessation of such business relations is not actionable where the publication contains nothing more than is necessary to accomplish its purpose.[23] But if the notice goes farther and impugns the character or reputation of the party or reflects upon him in such a manner as to injuriously affect him in his business the notice then becomes actionable per se.[24]

(II) Insolvency, Bankruptcy, or Want of Credit. The law carefully guards the credit of merchants, traders and business men, and oral or written words imputing to them insolvency, bankruptcy, or want of credit are actionable per se,[25] the rule applying to any one to whom credit is important in the prosecu-

Rhode Island.— Barr v. Providence Tel. Pub. Co., 27 R. I. 101, 60 Atl. 835, holding that a complaint for libel, charging that plaintiff was a horseshoer and carriage manufacturer, and that defendant published of plaintiff and certain others, who were members of the democratic committee of P, a statement derogatory to them as politicians, and containing an interrogatory asking what respectable citizen would select these men, who tell them who they must vote for, to represent them in a business transaction, etc., but containing nothing intimating that plaintiff was not skilled or competent in his business, was not libelous, within the act of 1647 (1 R. I. Col. Rec. p. 184), defining libel as a disparagement of a man in his trade or business.

Donaghue v. Gaffy, 54 Conn. 257, 7 Atl. 552; Donaghue v. Gaffy, 53 Conn. 43, 2 Atl. 397 (holding that where defendant, a retail liquor dealer, charged plaintiffs with overbidding him in a matter of a lease and turning him out of his place of business because he had ceased to buy from them, the charge is not actionable, as plaintiffs had a legal right to do that which was imputed to them); Hahnemannian L. Ins. Co. v. Beebe, 48 Ill. 87, 95 Am. Dec. 519 (holding that it is not libelous for a newspaper to assume that an insurance company proposes to do that which its charter authorizes it to do); Achorn v. Piper, 66 Iowa 694, 24 N. W. 513; Willis v. Eclipse Mfg. Co., 81 N. Y. App. Div. 591, 81 N. Y. Suppl. 359 (holding that a letter charging a merchant with "cutting prices" is not actionable, where there is no charge that he was bound not to cut the price); Smid v. Bernard, 31 Misc. (N. Y.) 35, 63 N. Y. Suppl. 278 (holding that it is not libelous per se to publish of a retail baker that he had started a fight against a bakers' labor union and had refused to employ its members because they would not work for fifty cents a day); Stone v. Cooper, 2 Den. (N. Y.) 293 (holding that a charge that plaintiff used money for "shaving purposes" is not actionable).

66. Hollingsworth v. Spectator Co., 49 N. Y. App. Div. 16, 63 N. Y. Suppl. 2.

67. Swan v. Thompson, 124 Cal. 193, 56 Pac. 878 (holding that a statement imputing drunkenness to a master mariner while in the command of a vessel in the discharge of his duties at sea is actionable per se); Orr v. Skofield, 56 Me. 483 (holding that to say a stock-broker,[68] or a ticket agent[69] in his business or profession are actionable per se. So language which charges a railroad with such incapacity or neglect in the conduct of its business that belief in the truth of the charges would as a natural and proximate consequence induce shippers of goods and passengers to refrain from employing it as a common carrier is actionable without proof of special damage.[70]

H. Imputations Affecting a Person in His Office or Employment — 1. In General. Imputations upon officers and employees are governed by the same general principles as those regulating charges made against a person in his business or profession.[71] There are two ways by which words not actionable in themselves may become so by being published of a person in respect to his office: (1) Where the act charged would be punished by indictment which would not be so if done by a person not in office;[72] (2) where the libel or slander tends to disgrace and disparage one in an office of profit or honor and to deprive him of it,[73] it not being necessary that the words should import a charge of crime.[74] Any language, whether spoken or written, imputing want of integrity, a lack of due qualification, or a dereliction of duty to an officer or employee is actionable per se.[75] The reason for the rule is that words which reflect upon the integrity or capacity of an officer tend to render his tenure precarious and to exclude him from office, and that plaintiff sold the consignment of a ship of which he was the master and "pocketed the money" is actionable); Kelly v. Huffington, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,671, 3 Cranch C. C. 81; Ingram v. Lawson, 6 Bing. N. Cas. 212, 4 Jur. 151, 9 L. J. C. P. 145, 8 Scott 471, 37 E. C. when the office is lucrative work a detriment from a pecuniary point of view.[76] Indeed it has been intimated that to make words actionable on the principle under discussion the charge must be of such a nature that if true it would be the cause for removal of the incumbent from office.[77] Where an action is brought for words alleged to have been spoken of a person in a particular office or employment, it must appear that he was holding the office or following the employment at the time the words were spoken.[78] However, to be libelous, it is sufficient that the words tend to expose the character of plaintiff to ridicule or contempt and to degrade him in the estimation of the community, although his term of office or employment had expired at the time of publication.[79]

want of capacity generally to perform the duties of his office[19] are actionable. It is necessary, however, that the words touch the justice in his office, and the use of the word "squire" alone is not sufficient to show that the charge was made against him as a justice.[20] So it has been held that words charging a justice of the peace with corrupt conduct in trying a cause over which he had no jurisdiction are not actionable on the theory that where a person under color of an office does an act beyond its authority and jurisdiction, he cannot be considered as an officer in committing that act, and the law will not protect him as such against the consequences of his unauthorized conduct.[21]

(III) Jurors. Words, oral or written, which tend to impeach the honesty or integrity of jurors in their office are actionable per se.[22]

d. Officers and Agents of Corporations and Associations. Words, written or spoken, concerning an officer or agent of a corporation or an association come within the general rule relating to imputations upon a person in his business or profession, and hence words imputing to such officer or agent lack of ability to perform the duties of his office,[23] want of integrity,[24] misappropriation of corporate funds,[25] or such other conduct as would render him unfit to hold his office,[26] are actionable. But an action will not lie on this principle for words spoken after the office has been abolished.[27] person in his employment or imputing to him such acts or conduct as to injuriously affect him therein are actionable.[28] Thus words imputing want of veracity,[29] dishonesty, and lack of integrity,[30] or unreliability and unworthiness of trust,[31] are actionable per se. So words imputing insanity are actionable per se, when spoken or written of one occupying a position of trust and confidence, in relation to his position.[32] But as in other cases the words must touch plaintiff in his particular employment.[33] Thus the rule has been stated that the actionable character of words published of a clerk must be tested by the question whether they impute to plaintiff the want of any qualification such as a clerk ought to have or any misconduct which would make him unfit to discharge faithfully and correctly all the duties of a clerk.[34]

A. 524, where it is said: "If there was a sufficient averment of special damages, then the question is, whether an imputation of the kind made by the defendant upon the plaintiff, when false, and when made for the express purpose of injuring the plaintiff in his profession, and when such injury is the probable and natural result of the speaking of the words, and when such injury actually follows, just as was intended by the defendant, will support an action by the plaintiff against the defendant. It is sometimes said that it will not, unless the words are defamatory. But the better rule is, that such an imputation, whether defamatory of the plaintiff or not, will support an action under the circum-

not defamatory.[39] It is generally agreed, however, that the special damage must be the natural and proximate consequence of the words used.[40] The test by which to determine whether special damage must be alleged and proved in order to make out a cause of action for defamation is whether the language is such as necessarily must or naturally and presumably will occasion pecuniary damage to the person of whom it is spoken.[41]

J. Construction of Language Used — 1. General Rule. At one time defamatory words were construed in mitiori sensu the object being to discourage litigation,[42] but this doctrine has long since been exploded.[43] And the rule now is that the words are to be taken in their plain and natural meaning and to be understood by courts and juries as other people would understand them, and according to the sense in which they appear to have been used and the ideas they are adapted to convey to those who heard or read them.[44] Where words, stances above mentioned. There are all the elements of a wrongful act deliberately done for the purpose of working an injury, and actually working one, even though the words have no meaning which, strictly speaking, could be called defamatory. . . . It may not be technically an action for slander, if the words are not defamatory; but the name of the action is of no consequence."

5. Understanding of Particular Reader no Criterion. Nor, it has been said, is it the understanding of any particular reader that is to determine the question.[51] Thus the fact that supersensitive persons with morbid imaginations may be able by reading between the lines of an article to discover some defamatory meaning therein is not sufficient to make it libelous.[52]

6. Charge of Crime. In order to be actionable as charging a crime it is not necessary that the words should impute the offense with the technical accuracy required in an indictment or that they should make the charge in express terms.[53] If the defamatory words, taken in their natural and ordinary signification, fairly import a criminal charge, it is sufficient.[54] So words not actionable in themselves may express a criminal charge by reason of their allusion to some extrinsic fact, or in consequence of being used and understood in a particular sense different from their natural meaning and thus become actionable.[55] But words are not actionable, although ordinarily importing a crime if they are spoken or written in a different sense and understood in that sense by the person addressed.[56] If, however, words charging a crime are spoken with reference to some transaction not amounting to the crime charged, the hearers must understand the reference in order to render the words harmless and not actionable.[57]

K. Certainty and Positiveness of Charge — 1. In General. To maintain an action for libel or slander it is not necessary that the charge should be direct and positive — the imputation may be inferred from an indirect communication,[58] as where defendant "expresses a suspicion, or institutes a comparison, or delivers the words as matter of hear-say . . . or answer, or exclamation, or uses disjunctive or adjective words, or speaks ironically."[59] Insinuations may be as defamatory as direct assertions, since the effect and tendency of the language used and not its form is the criterion.[60]

2. Imputation by Expressing Belief or Opinion. A defamatory charge published as an expression of belief or opinion is as effectual as if made in positive language, for the publisher must be understood to assert that there is in his mind evidence sufficient to convince him that the charge is true;[61] and the fact that the reasons

3. Imputations by Expressing Mere Suspicion. In some jurisdictions the rule has been laid down that words conveying a mere suspicion that a person has committed a crime are not actionable per se.[63] But in other jurisdictions the rule is that where the obvious tendency of a publication is to fasten suspicion of the commission of a crime on plaintiff, it is actionable.[64]

4. Imputations in Interrogative Form. An actionable imputation may be as effectually made by way of interrogation as by an affirmative allegation.[65]

5. Imputations in Conditional Form. Where the charge is conditional in its form, the actionable quality of the imputation depends upon the fact assumed in the conditional clause. If defendant makes the charge to depend upon a fact which he has stated conditionally but which is known to be true, it is equivalent to a direct charge and actionable.[66]

6. Imputations in Alternative Form. An imputation in alternative form is actionable only when both alternatives are defamatory and if either alternative statement is harmless, the charge is not actionable.[67]

7. Ironical Words. Words may be ironical and yet be actionable as much as if expressed in the most positive and direct form of averment.[68]

8. ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF PREVIOUS CHARGE. An acknowledgment merely of having published defamatory words cannot be the foundation of an action, and is material only as evidence of the former charge.[69]

9. INDEFINITENESS OR ERROR AS TO PERSON DEFAMED — a. In General. Defamatory words to be actionable must refer to some ascertained or ascertainable person and that person must be plaintiff.[70] Plaintiff need not be named in the slanderous or libelous publication if matters of description or other references therein or the extrinsic facts and circumstances are sufficient to show that he was intended as the object of it and was so understood by others.[71] It is not necessary that all the world should understand that the charge referred to plaintiff; it is sufficient that those who know plaintiff can make out that he is the person meant.[72] Where a publication is libelous or slanderous per se the fact that it is made to apply to plaintiff, although a mistake as to the initials of the person intended, will be no excuse.[73] On the other hand it has been held that the names used in a publication is not conclusive, and that if the publication viewed in connection with the publicly known circumstances is such that it could refer to one personally, no other person would have a right of action, even if, by reason of identity of name with that used in the publication, he might sustain injury thereby.[74]

b. Imputations Affecting a Class. Where the defamatory matter has no specific personal application and is so general that no individual damages can be presumed, and the class referred to is so numerous that great vexation and oppression might grow out of a multiplicity of suits, no private suit can be maintained.[75] But although the defamatory publication is directed against a particular class of persons or a group, yet any one of that class or group may maintain an action upon showing that the words apply especially to him.[76]

10. Repetition — a. Repetition With Authorship Credited to Others — (i) Libel. It is no justification in an action for libel that the libelous matter was previously published by a third person and that defendant at the time of his publication disclosed the name of the author.[77]

75. Illinois.— Story v. Jones, 52 Ill. App. 112, holding that to say of a man that he belonged to the Missouri home guards, and that it is a band of robbers, is not actionable, as there is no charge that any particular member was a robber but merely that he might be a robber.

Michigan.— McGraw v. Detroit Free Press Co., 85 Mich. 203, 48 N. (II) Slander. In several of the earlier cases in England and in this country the rule has been stated that in an action for slander it is a good defense to show that the words were spoken on the authority of another, whose name was given at the time the repetition was made.[78] But the modern rule is that a person is not justified in repeating a slanderous charge, although he at the time names the author,[79] unless at least it appears that he acted without any malicious intent, the quo animo with which the charge was repeated being the controlling consideration in some jurisdictions.[80]

b. Repetition Credited to Rumor or Report. A man may slander or libel another as effectually by circulating rumors or reports, or by putting his communications, spoken or written, in the shape of hearsays, as by making distinct assertions of defamatory matter; and hence the fact that the slanderous or libelous words are published with the qualification "if reports are true," "report says," or other similar qualification, will not alter the actionable character of the words.[81]

Written publication of story previously told by plaintiff.— It has been held libelous to publish in a newspaper a story calculated to render plaintiff ludicrous, even where it appears that plaintiff had told the story of himself, it not appearing that he had authorized the publication in the newspaper. Publication of writing defined.—Publication of a defamatory writing is the making it known, after it has been written, to some person other than him of whom it is written. Pullman v. Hill, [1891] 1 Q. B. 524, 60 L. J. Q. B. 299, 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 691, 39 Wkly. Rep. 263 [quoted in Gambrill v. Schooley, 93 Md. 48, 60, 48 Atl. 730, 86 Am. St. Rep. 414, 52 L. R. defense to an action for slander that the words were spoken to and not of plaintiff, when others were present and heard the words spoken.[84]

2. PUBLICATION TO PLAINTIFF'S FAMILY. Defendant's liability is not qualified by the fact that the defamatory words were communicated to members of plaintiff's family only, since as much protection is due a man's reputation in the presence of his family as in the presence of strangers.[85] Thus a publication to the husband or wife of plaintiff is a publication within the contemplation of law.[86]

3. PUBLICATION TO WIFE OF DEFENDANT. On the principle that husband and wife are one person in law the rule has been stated that a communication of defamatory matter by defendant to his wife in confidence is not a publication.[87]

4. OFFICIAL COMMUNICATIONS. The delivery of a libel by one officer of the government to another for no public or official purpose is a publication.[88] But it has been held that neither the sending of an official communication relating to public business nor retaining a copy thereof amounts to a publication within the meaning of that term as used in the law of libel.[89]

C. Extent of Publication. To constitute a publication it is not necessary that the contents of the written or spoken communication should be made known to the public generally. It is enough if they are made known to a single person.[90]

D. Defamatory Matter Not Understood by Hearers or Readers. It must be shown that the libelous or slanderous matter was communicated to some third person who understood it since otherwise there is no publication.[91] Thus if words were spoken in a foreign language, which no one present understood, no

The word "published" imports the communication of the defamatory writing to some third person or persons. McLaughlin v. Schnellbacher, 65 Ill. App. 50, 55 [citing Burton v. Burton, 3 Greene (Iowa) 316; Watts v. Greenlee, 13 N. C. 115; Duel v. Agan, 1 Code Rep. (N. Y.) 134].

In North Carolina it has been held that in an indictment under the code for slandering an innocent woman, words spoken by the husband in the presence of the wife were published where it appeared that they were not of a gentle and confidential character, but were spoken in a loud tone which could have been heard a long way off, and besides it appeared from the testimony that a negro woman was near, and one of the witnesses was in hearing, although he testified that the language used by defendant was different from that charged by the prosecutrix. action will lie therefor.[92] So in order to prove the publication of a letter written in a foreign language, it must be shown that it was read by some one other than plaintiff, who understood that language.[93] On the other hand it has been held that the presumption is that an article in the Dutch language printed in a local Dutch newspaper of large circulation in this country is understood by its readers without an English translation.[94]

E. Modes of Publishing Libel — 1. In General. Merely to compose or write a libel is not a publication.[95] If a libel was not intended for publication and copies were taken without the consent of defendant, there is no publication by defendant.[96] So it has been intimated that if the person who writes a libel shuts it up in his desk and a thief steals it, that cannot be said to be a publication of it.[97] But an actionable publication may be made as well by composing or writing a libel, that it may be published, if publication follow, as by circulating it afterward, and if a person having written libelous matter publishes it or causes it to be published by another, an action for libel will lie against him.[98]

2. By Letter — a. In General. The writing of a libelous letter against one person and placing it in the post-office directed to another person who receives and reads it is a publication of the libel;[99] but the publication is not complete

Libelous matter not kept within exclusive possession of defendant. — In Beardsley v. Tappen, 2 Fed. Cas. No. 1,188*a*, it was held that in an action against the manager of a mercantile agency for libel in making a false report of plaintiff's business standing, publication of the libel is sufficiently shown by proof that the books in which it is contained were not in defendant's exclusive possession, but that others in his office had access thereto and that they and a merchant in the city heard or read the alleged slander.

St. Rep. 819 (holding that signing a libelous paper when it is being carried around to procure signatures and delivering it when signed to the carrier or another person, without knowing that it would afterward be printed, is itself a publication of the libelous matter by the party signing it).

Where publisher rewrites libelous article. — In Klos v. Zahorik, 113 Iowa 161, 84 N. W. 1046, 53 L. R. A. 235, it was held that where defendant wrote an article to a newspaper which rewrote and changed it before it was published it was not sufficient to show that defendant participated in the publication of the article but that it must be shown that he participated in the publication of the libelous matter. But where a libel is sent to a newspaper and the editor strikes out the most libelous part and publishes the remainder, the writer is liable for the part published. until it is received and read by some third person.[1] Sending a sealed libelous letter through the mail to the person libeled,[2] with no reason to suppose that it will be opened and read by any one else before he has received and read it is not a publication which will support a civil action for libel.[3] But the rule is to the contrary where defendant believed or had good reason to believe that the letter might be read by a third person.[4] Thus sending an unsealed letter by a messenger who reads it,[5] or sending a letter to a person, who because of inability to read is obliged to procure another to read it,[6] constitutes a publication. So too sending a letter to one whose clerk is in the known habit of opening his letters, Nebr. (Unoff.) 79, 96 N. W. 158, it was held that where a libelous letter concerning plaintiff was sent by mail addressed to plaintiff's employer and plaintiff jointly, and delivered at the employer's shop where it was found by plaintiff and turned over unopened to her employer who read it, this was a sufficient publication.

Letter sent to third person by mistake.— In Fox v. Broderick, 14 Ir. C. L. 453, it was held that a letter sent by mistake to the employer of plaintiff instead of to plaintiff is actionable and it is no defense that the publication was by mistake.

If any third person read or heard a libelous letter read there would be a publication of it, and this whether such third person obtained knowledge of its contents by design or through inadvertence. McLaughlin v. Schnellbacher, 65 Ill. App. 50. The depositing of a letter in the post-office would be a publication of it, although it never came into the hands of him for whom it was intended, if it came to those of any one else, because a wrong-doer is answerable for all the consequences of his act. and who actually reads the letter in question,[7] has been held to constitute a publication within the rule.

b. Sending Letter to Agent. If a person composes a libel and sends it to his agent, to be read by him, and it reaches its destination and is read by such agent, it is a sufficient publication to support an action.[8]

3. By Postal Card. It has been held that the transmission through the mails of an uncovered postal card containing matter libelous of the person to whom it is addressed is an actionable publication.[9]

4. By Telegram. The writing of a message and the delivery of it to the telegraph company for transmission to plaintiff is a publication by the writer.[10] So where a libelous message is delivered in writing to one operator of a telegraph company and is by him forwarded over the company's wires to the receiving operator to be by him reduced to writing and delivered to plaintiff, such forwarding constitutes a publication by the company,[11] and the fact that the message was transmitted over the wires by sound does not render the publication oral instead of written.[12]

5. By Dictation to Stenographer. The dictation of libelous matter by defendant to his stenographer by whom a typewritten copy is made and transmitted to plaintiff after being signed by defendant is in law a publication of the libel,

A. 661, where it is said: "When the means of reproducing the contents of a writing are by repeating its contents orally to another, to enable him to put it into writing, and the person to whom it is repeated reduces it to writing, the writing thus produced does not depend for its identification on the oral utterances of the person who reads or repeats, but on the writing itself, which is thus communicated to the person who reduces it to writing; and it can make no difference whether the contents of the writing are communicated by sound over telegraph wires by one operator to another or by a person in audible words to an amanuensis at his side. See McCoombs v. Tuttle, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 431; Adams v. Lawson, 17 Gratt. (Va.) 250, 94 Am. Dec. 455; Pullman v. Hill, [1891] 1 Q. B. 524, 60 L. J. Q. B. 299, 64 L. T. Rep. N. S. 691, 39 Wkly. Rep. 263. As long ago as Lamb's Case, 9 Coke 59*b*, it was held that where one knowing a writing to be a libel 'reads it to others that is an unlawful publication of it;' and in 'The Case De Libellis Famosis,' 5 Coke 124*b*, it was held that a 'libel may be published (1) verbis aut cantilenis, as where it is maliciously repeated or sung in the presence of others.' It is not necessary to go as far as this in order to hold that the facts in the present case constituted the publication of a libel." See also Peterson v. Western Union Tel. Co., 65 Minn. 18, 67 N. W. 646.

although there is no communication of the letter by defendant to any other person.[13] On the other hand it has been held that where a manager of a corporation in connection with its business dictated a libelous letter to a stenographer in the corporation's employment, the dictation, copying, and mailing constituted but a single act of the corporation and did not amount to a publication as the acts of both servants were necessary to make the letter complete.[14]

6. Printing. An action to recover damages for libel cannot be maintained upon proof simply that the libelous words were composed and were in existence as printed matter, without being known to any one except the author and the victim.[15] But printing a libel is regarded as a publication when possession of the printed matter is delivered with the expectation that it will be read by some third person, provided that result actually follows.[16]

7. Reading Libel to Third Person. It is a sufficient publication of a libel if defendant reads it in the presence of others.[17] So the repetition to third persons of the contents of a letter to plaintiff is a sufficient publication.[18]

8. Giving Writing to Third Person to Copy. The giving of a libel as writing by defendant to a third person to copy for defendant is a publication.[19]

F. Repetition or Republication. A substantial reiteration of a prior defamatory publication by defendant amounts to a republication for which he will be responsible and this, although a verdict for damages for the prior publication has already been recovered.[20] It has been held, however, that words repeated to persons who have previously heard them from defendant under circumstances making them privileged are not actionable.[21] So the repetition of words in the presence of the slandered only is not actionable.[22]

sented to or authorized the publication complained of, he cannot recover for any injury sustained by reason of the publication;[23] and the same rule applies to a publication solicited or induced by inquiry on the part of plaintiff or his agent,[24] at least if it was procured by the fraudulent contrivance of plaintiff himself, with a view to an action.[25] So the repetition in the presence of a third person and at the special request or instance of plaintiff or his agent of words originally spoken by defendant in the presence of plaintiff only is not an actionable publication.[26] So the repetition by defendant of slanderous words, spoken by another at the request of plaintiff, will not sustain an action.[27] But it has been held that while a mere acknowledgment to plaintiff in the presence of a third person of having spoken slanderous words to other third persons is not the foundation of an action,[28] yet where a person originates a slander and afterward repeats it in answer to a question by the person slandered in the presence of a third person brought by him for the purpose of hearing the answer, the repetition is actionable.[29]

V. INTENT AND MALICE.

A. Intent in General. The publication of defamatory matter actionable per se entitles the party defamed to compensation for the actual injury done him without regard to the motive with which the publication was made; want of actual intent to injure furnishes no legal excuse.[30] Thus it is held to be no defense that the words were spoken in jest or merriment,[31] that defendant was drunk when he uttered the slander,[32] or that the publication was the result of an honest mistake,[33] as for instance the publisher's ignorance that the publication contained libelous matter.[34]

B. Malice. There has been much confusion regarding the use and meaning of the word "malice" in the law of libel and slander. The different views, while the cause of much controversy and misunderstanding, do not in fact create divergence in the substantive law of defamation, as their ultimate effect is identical.[35] The rule as stated in some of the authorities is that malice is not a necessary ingredient of a cause of action for libel or slander, and that if the publication is defamatory, and is not privileged or justifiable, actual or compensatory damages are recoverable irrespective of the question of malice.[36] On the other hand malice has been divided into two distinct classes, to wit, malice in law and malice in fact.[37] In the decisions in which these two classes of malice are recognized the rule is laid down that while malice is an essential ingredient of libel or slander or, laid down that the cases of constructive malice are exclusively such as involve words capable of bearing in themselves a defamatory meaning, and that when a hidden defamatory meaning is sought to be attributed to words in themselves innocent and on their face containing no such sense, by extrinsic facts outside and independent of the publication itself, the knowledge of such facts must be shown by averment and proof to have existed in the mind of defendant at the time of publication.[44]

VI. PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

A. In General. From motives of public policy the law recognizes certain communications or publications as privileged;[45] that is, communications which under ordinary circumstances would be slanderous or libelous are held to be privileged when spoken or written on or in connection with a lawful occasion.[46] Privileged communications are of two kinds, those absolutely privileged and those qualifiedly privileged. An absolutely privileged communication is one for which an action will not lie, even though the words are published maliciously and with knowledge of their falsity, whereas a qualifiedly privileged communication is one which is prima facie privileged only and in which the privilege may be lost by proof of malice in the publication of the libel or slander.[47] The occasion of making a communication qualifiedly privileged rebuts the prima facie inference of malice arising from the publication of matter prejudicial to the character of Privileged "occasion" and "communication" distinguished.— "Confusion sometimes arises between an 'occasion' of privilege, and a 'privileged communication.' There may be an occasion of privilege without a privileged communication, but not the latter without the former. This confusion may be plaintiff and throws upon him the onus of proving malice in fact.[48] Hence the characteristic feature of "absolute" as distinguished from "conditional" privilege is that in the former the question of malice is not open and all inquiry into good faith is closed.[49]

B. Communications Absolutely Privileged[50] — 1. In General. The doctrine of absolute privilege is founded on the principle that in certain cases it is advantageous for the public interest that persons should not be in any way fettered in their statements and is confined to cases where the public service or the due administration of justice requires that a person shall speak his mind freely.[51]

2. Particular Classes — a. Legislative Proceedings — (I) Utterances by Members of Legislature. A member of the legislature is not liable in an action of libel or slander for words published in the discharge of his official duties, even though made maliciously.[52] But this privilege does not extend to words spoken unofficially, although in the legislative hall and while the legislature is in session.[53]

(II) Memorials and Petitions. Memorials and petitions to the legislature for the redress of grievances are held to be absolutely privileged when pertinent to the proceedings to which the communications relate.[54] On the other hand it has been held that a communication made by a citizen voluntarily appearing before a legislative committee is not absolutely privileged, although it is qualifiedly privileged if made in good faith and without malice.[55]

b. Judicial Proceedings — (I) In General. As a general rule libelous or slanderous matter published in the due course of a judicial proceeding is absolutely privileged and will not support an action for defamation, although made maliciously and with knowledge of its falsity.[56] avoided by remembering that these phrases are technical terms used in respect to the evidence by which malice in defendant — the real issue of fact — is determined. Where the evidence establishes circumstances which the law says support a duty to make a statement of facts honestly believed to be true, or an honest comment on facts, such circumstances are called an occasion of privilege; and when the evidence goes further, and shows that on such occasion defendant made the communication complained of in good faith with honest intent to perform that duty, it is said the evidence has established a privileged communication. But in all cases the simple question in issue is, Was the damage suffered by plaintiff caused by the malice of defendant?" Atwater v. Morning New Co., 67 Conn. 504, 516, 34 Atl. 865.

and malicious[65] and are made under cover and pretense of a wrongful or groundless suit.[66] The matter to which the privilege does not extend must be so palpably wanting in relation to the subject-matter that no reasonable man can doubt its irrelevancy.[67] But where it is apparent that the allegations are wholly gratuitous, irrelevant, and immaterial they are not privileged,[68] and in such case it will be no justification merely to show that they were believed to be true.[69]

Affidavit or statement to non-judicial officer.— In Reid v. McLendon, 44 Ga. 156, defendant made an affidavit before United States officers which caused plaintiff's cotton to be confiscated and sold. The affidavit was not considered as made in a judicial proceeding but as furnishing information to the government and was privileged if made in good faith and on demand of the United

other hand there are decisions making the privileged character of complaints preferred against offenders before a judicial officer depend upon the question whether the person acted bona fide in making the complaint, and this rule has been applied where the alleged defamatory imputation was followed up by criminal proceedings actually instituted,[71] or where it was embodied in a formal affidavit or complaint,[72] as well as where it consisted merely of a verbal charge not followed up by an affidavit on the institution of proceedings.[73]

Statement in affidavit and verbal charge distinguished.— In Nissen v. Cramer, 104 N. C. 574, 576, 10 S. E. 676, 6 L. R. A. 780, it is said: "In Briggs v. Byrd, 34 N. C. 377, this Court held, that there was a presumption of good faith in favor of one who made a verbal charge of larceny to a Justice of the Peace against another, with the expressed purpose, not afterwards carried out, of filing a formal affidavit embodying the charge, and that in an action for slander, founded upon the statement to the Justice, the plaintiff must prove the existence of malice when the words were uttered. On the other hand, it is a well established rule that when one actually lodges information before a judicial officer that he is informed that another has committed a felony, or infamous offence, the informer is absolutely protected against an action for slander based upon his affidavit, and a person claiming to have sustained injury has no remedy, unless the facts will enable him to maintain an action for malicious prosecution." sive to the questions propounded, it is immaterial that it is false and given maliciously,[75] or that neither plaintiff nor defendant were parties to the actions in which the alleged defamatory testimony was given.[76] So it is sufficient if the words are uttered under an honest belief that they are relevant and pertinent, whether they are so in fact or not.[77] But a witness will not be permitted with impunity to volunteer defamatory statements which are irrelevant to the matter of inquiry and which he does not reasonably believe to be relevant.[78]

In England the rule goes somewhat farther than the rule of the text, or at least the rule is applied liberally for the protection of the witness, and it is held that the testimony of a witness having reference to the inquiry is absolutely privileged, notwithstanding it may be malicious. Seaman v. Netherclift, 2 C. P. D. 53, 46 L. J. C. P. 128, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 784, 25 Wkly. Rep. 159 [affirming 1 C. P. D. 540]. See also Wright v. Lothrop, 149 Mass. 385, 21 N. E. 963. This rule has been extended to a military man who is called before a court of inquiry for the purpose of testifying upon a matter of military discipline (Dawkins v. Rokeby, L. R. 7 H. L. 744, 45 L. J. Q. B. 8, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 196, 23 Wkly. Rep. 931 [affirming L. R. 8 Q. B. 255]) as well as to testimony given by a person in the character of a witness before a select committee of the house of commons (Goffin v. Donnelly, 6 Q. B. D. 307, 45 J. P. 439, 50 L. J. Q. B. 303, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 141, 29 Wkly. Rep. 440). But what a witness says before he enters or after he has left the witness' box is not privileged. Trotman v. Dunn, 4 Camph. 211. So it has been intimated that if a man when in the witness' box, were to take advantage of his position to utter something having no reference to the cause as matter of inquiry, in order to assail the character of another, his statement would not be within the privilege. (VI) Briefs, Arguments, and Statements of Counsel. In England no action will lie against an advocate for defamatory words spoken with reference to, and in the course of, an inquiry before a judicial tribunal, although they are uttered maliciously and without any justification or excuse, and are irrelevant to every issue of fact which is contested before the tribunal.[79] But the rule generally prevailing in this country is that whatever is said or written by counsel in a legal proceeding, pertinent and material to the matter in controversy, is absolutely privileged and no action can be maintained upon it.[80] But in applying this principle the courts are said to be liberal even to the extent of declaring that where matter is put forth by counsel in the course of a judicial proceeding that may possibly be pertinent they will not so regard it as to deprive its author of his privilege.[81] The same privilege is extended to a party who acts as his own counsel and accordingly, when in the absence of the prosecutor, a complainant is acting as party or counsel in the management of a criminal prosecution before a magistrate, either as a matter of right, or by permission of the magistrate, he is entitled to the same privileges as a party or counsel in other judicial proceedings.[82] But a party or counsel cannot avail himself of his situation to gratify private malice by

There is also support by authorities in this country for this absolute exemption from liability on the part of judges.[89] On the other hand the rule has been stated that communications of this character are privileged if they are material and pertinent or at least if they are in good faith believed to be pertinent and material.[90] relating to state matters by one officer of state to another in the course of his official duty is absolutely privileged and cannot be made the subject of an action for libel.[94] So in this country it has been held that the head of an executive department of government cannot be held liable to a civil suit for damages on account of official communications made by him pursuant to a legislative act and in respect to matters within his authority, by reason of any personal motive that might be alleged to have prompted his action.[95] Likewise it has been held that a petition to a governor for the removal of an officer,[96] or to a fire marshal to institute an inquiry as to the cause of a fire,[97] or a resolution offered in a city council by a member,[98] or a message by a mayor to a council announcing his veto of a bill passed by council and his reasons therefor,[99] is absolutely privileged provided the communication is pertinent and material.

C. Communications Qualifiedly Privileged[1] — 1. In General — a. General Rule Stated. Where a party makes a communication and such communication is prompted by a duty owed either to the public or to a third party, or the communication is one in which the party has an interest and it is made to another having a corresponding interest, the communication is privileged if made in good faith and without actual malice.[2]

been held that expressions in excess of what the occasion warrants do not per se take away the privilege, although such excess may be evidence of malice for the consideration of the jury.[5]

(II) Excessive Publication. A qualified privilege is not lost by the mere fact that the communication, whether oral or written, is incidentally brought to the attention of others than those for whom it was intended.[6] Thus the mere fact that an oral communication is made in the hearing of others than the parties immediately interested will not of itself defeat the defense of privilege.[7] But it has been held that the privilege is lost if strangers to the privileged occasion were present by the invitation or design of defendant.[8] So it is held that malice may be established by the unnecessary publicity of the communication.[9]

(III) Sending Privileged Matter by Telegram. So it has been held that a communication which would be privileged if sent by letter becomes unprivileged if sent through the telegraph office.[10]

2. Official Communications — a. In General. The rule making communications made in discharge of a public duty qualifiedly privileged applies to reports or other communications made by public officials in the course of their duties.[11]

3. Communications Relative to Appointment of Public Officers. The selection of suitable persons for the performance of official service is essential to the interests of both the government and the citizen, and hence communications to the appointing power,[13] or, it has been held, to an officer who defendant might naturally suppose could prevent the appointment,[14] with reference to the character and qualifications of candidates for public office, are generally regarded as illustrations of qualifiedly or conditionally privileged publications, and in such cases no action will lie for false statements in the publication unless they are also malicious and the burden of proof in this respect rests upon plaintiff.

7. Proceedings For Church, Lodge, or Society Discipline. Persons who join churches, secret societies, benevolent, or temperance organizations submit to the jurisdiction of those bodies in matters of faith and individual conduct affecting their relations as members and subject themselves to tribunals established by those bodies to pass upon such questions. Accusations made by one member against another, to a body competent to try the offense, or words spoken or written in the course of an investigation or trial, either by the prosecutor, defendant, or witnesses are privileged when made without malice, in the regular course of discipline prescribed by the rules and regulations of the society.[21]

Judicial statement of rule.— In Farnsworth v. Storrs, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 412, 415, it is said: "Amongst these powers and privileges, established by long and immemorial usage, churches have authority to deal with their members, for immoral and scandalous conduct; and for that purpose, to hear complaints, to take evidence and to decide; and upon conviction, to administer proper punishment by way of rebuke, censure, suspension and excommunication. To this jurisdiction, every member, by entering into the church covenant, submits, and is bound by his consent. Remington v. Congdon, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 310, 13 Am. Dec. 431. The proceedings of the church are quasi-judicial, and therefore those who complain, or give testimony, or act and vote, or pronounce the result, orally or in writing, acting in good faith, and within the scope of the authority conferred by this limited jurisdiction, and not falsely or colorably, making such proceedings a pretence for covering an intended scandal, are protected by law."

Communications relating to non-members. In Etchison v. Pergerson, 88 Ga. 620, 15 S. E. 680, it was held that when one church member is a witness on the trial of another before a proper church tribunal, a bona fide disclosure of all relevant facts is incumbent upon him as a private moral duty, and if those facts necessarily involve misconduct or even a crime on the part of a person not a member of the church, the naming of such person as a part of the relevant testimony of the witness is within the protection of the privileged occasion. But in Coombs v. Rose, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 155, it was held that if in making accusations against a member of the church, in the regular course of church discipline, the character of one not a member is attacked, the communication is not as to the latter privileged. In Nix v. Caldwell, 81 Ky. 293, 50 Am. Rep. 163, A was on trial before a masonic lodge. B testified and C made an affidavit that B could not be believed under oath. Neither B nor C were masons. It was held that there was no duty resting upon C to make the affidavit and that it was not privileged.

Probable cause for making charge.— It has been held that where libelous charges are privileged because preferred to a lodge tribunal, the fact that the party making the charge had probable cause for speaking the words is a justification, although he was actuated by malice and acted in bad faith. Streety v. Wood, 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 105. But in Dial v. Holter, 6 Ohio St. 228, it was held that defamatory words, used in a complaint to a church to bring plaintiff to trial before a church committee, although privileged are actionable, if made wilfully and maliciously, even though made on probable cause.

Where charges made against the president of a college affecting his personal character and competency were investigated by a board of trustees, the speech of the president in his defense containing matter pertinent and relevant to the issue, and published by the com-

8. COMMUNICATIONS IN FURTHERANCE OF CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS. Upon grounds of public policy communications which would otherwise be slanderous are protected as privileged, if they are made in good faith in the prosecution of an inquiry regarding a crime which has been committed, and for the purpose of detecting and bringing to punishment the criminal.[22] It is not enough that defendant should have made the communication to an officer, but he must have made it for the purpose of protecting himself and preventing a crime, or of detecting and bringing a criminal to punishment.[23] So a person who in the presence of a public officer wantonly and maliciously, in entire disregard of the right of another, charges the latter with crime, cannot rely on the protection of the privilege.[24]

9. COMMUNICATIONS IN COURSE OF MUTUAL CONTROVERSY. The law justifies a man in repelling a defamatory charge by a denial or by an explanation. He has a qualified privilege to answer the charge, and if he does so in good faith, and what he publishes is fairly an answer, and is published for the purpose of repelling the charge and not with malice, it is privileged, although it be false.[25] But the mittee in connection with the other proceedings, was held to be privileged. Gattis v. Kilgo, 128 N. C. 402, 38 S. E. 931.

The entry of the resolution of excommunication from membership in a church on the minute-book of the session and the exhibition of it to the members for their signatures does not constitute a publication. Proceedings without jurisdiction. — Where the laws governing a medical society do not justify the action taken by the society in expelling a member, no privilege attaches to the proceedings. Fawcett v. Charles, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 473.

A circular issued by one member of a society to others for the purpose of obtaining a statutory investigation is not privileged. Hill v. Hart-Davies, 21 Ch. D. 798, 51 L. J. Ch. 845, 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 82, 31 Wkly. Rep. 22.

Publishing in church paper result of investigation. — In Redgate v. Roush, 61 Kan. 480, 59 Pac. 1050, 48 L. R. A. 236, it was held that where the officers of a church upon inquiry find that their pastor is unfit for his office and in the performance of what they honestly believe to be their duty toward other members and churches of the same denomination publish in good faith in the church papers the result of their inquiry, and there is reasonable occasion for such publication, it will be deemed to be privileged. privilege under this rule is limited to retorts or answers which are necessary to the defense or fairly arise out of the charges made, and hence if the defamatory matter published by defendant is not a proper reply to the matter published by plaintiff which provoked its publication, it will be actionable irrespective of the question of malice.[26]

10. Communications at Request of Person Defamed. As a general proposition where defamatory matter is published in the form of an answer made to inquiries by plaintiff or his agent, the answer is privileged,[27] if the answer of defendant does not go beyond plaintiff's question.[28] So if plaintiff either personally or through his agents invites and procures the publication of defamatory matter for the purpose of making it the foundation of an action, the communication will be privileged,[29] unless there has been a previous publication of the same defamatory matter by defendant.[30] Where a person originates a slander, and afterward repeats it in answer to a question by the person slandered, in the presence of a third person brought by him for the purpose of hearing the answer, it has been held that the repetition is not a privileged communication.[31] Where, however, a person does not originate a slander, and being applied to by the person whose character is affected thereby makes, in the presence of a third person, a communication in answer to questions put to him, such communication is privileged.[32]

11. COMMUNICATIONS IN DISCHARGE OF DUTY TO OTHERS — a. In General. A communication is privileged when made in good faith in answer to one having an interest in the information sought,[33] or if volunteered, when the party to whom the communication is made has an interest in it and the writer or speaker stands in such relation to him as to make it a reasonable duty or at least proper that he should give the information.[34] A communication, however, is not privileged merely because published in strict confidence and between friends.[35] The authorities are conflicting as to the responsibility of a stranger voluntarily making a communication to another where there is no common interest in the subject-matter, and the interest is confined solely to the party receiving the communication.[36] In some of the decisions the rule is broadly stated that everyone who believes himself to be possessed of knowledge which, if true, does or may affect the rights and interests of another, has the right, in good faith, to communicate such, his belief, to that other.[37] On the other hand the doctrine has been limited in the case of volunteered communications to cases where the parties by reason of their relation to each other are interested in the subject-matter of inquiry, or to cases where the well being of society requires that a party in possession of what he supposes to be facts should disclose them.[38] So the information must be given to one who is reasonably and properly entitled to it.[39]

Communication to husband in regard to wife.— In Beals v. Thompson, 149 Mass. 405, 21 N. E. 959, it was held that the fact that plaintiff owed money to defendant before her marriage, which she refused to pay, does not render a defamatory letter concerning her conduct before marriage, written by defendant to her husband, a privileged communication, since the husband was under no obligation to pay the debts of the wife contracted before her marriage.

an infant, charging the latter with a crime committed in connection with his employment, is prima facie privileged when made to the parent of the employee.[41]

c. Communication as to Character of Suitor or Lover. Statements regarding the character of a suitor or lover made in answer to inquiries by one interested, or when volunteered by one who is under a duty to make it on account of his relationship, are privileged if made in good faith.[42] But such communications if volunteered will not be protected merely on the ground that the parties making them hold friendly relations with those to whom the communications are made.[43] Thus a letter written to a woman containing libelous matter concerning her suitor is not justified by the fact that the writer was her friend and former pastor and that the letter was written at the request of her parents who assented to all its contents.[44]

d. Communication as to Character of Employee. A communication derogatory of the character of an employee, made to the employer or to one about to employ such person and for the employer's benefit, is privileged, when made in good faith, and this whether the information was voluntarily given or was in answer to an inquiry.[45] But where the communication is made solely for the benefit of the informant, as for instance to compel the employee to pay a debt due the informant, it is not privileged.[46] Where one has given a recommendation to an employee and facts subsequently coming to his knowledge cause him to change his opinion, he is privileged to communicate such facts to a party with whom employment has been obtained on the strength of the recommendation.[47]

But it has been held that the fact that the person to whom a letter alleged to be libelous is sent had taken a special interest in the party concerning whom it is written and had recommended him for employment is insufficient to create a duty on the part of the writer so as to bring the letter within the rule of privileged communications.[48]

e. Reports of Mercantile Standing — (i) By Mercantile Agencies. The principle that a communication which would otherwise be actionable is privileged if made in good faith upon a matter involving an interest or duty of the party making it to a person having a corresponding interest or duty applies to an agent or agency employed to procure information as to the solvency, credit, and standing of another, where the information is communicated confidentially and in good faith to a principal having an interest in the subject-matter.[49] But a communication from a mercantile agency is privileged only when made to one having an interest in the particular matter and not when it is published in a report for general circulation among subscribers.[50]

(ii) By Mutual Protective Associations. The doctrine of qualified privilege has been applied to information furnished to members or subscribers by mutual protective associations.[51] On the other hand it is held that where such an association is formed not for the purpose of keeping its subscribers informed as to the credit and standing of the parties with whom they deal, but of blacklisting

On the other hand, however, a publication made to others than those interested is not privileged.[57]

c. Common Membership in Church, Lodge, or Society. Representations made by a member of a church, lodge, or society regarding the character or conduct of another member are privileged when made in good faith to one having authority under the laws of the organization to receive charges for the purpose of discipline or removal.[58] But common membership will not protect the publication of defamatory matter concerning another member, where the member addressed had no duty to perform or interest to serve which made it necessary or proper for the information to be given to him.[59]

13. Communications in Protection of Defendant's Interest — a. In General. A communication made by a person immediately concerned in interest in the subject-matter to which it relates, for the purpose of protecting his own interest, in the full belief that the communication is true and without any malicious motive, is privileged,[60] where the communication is made to one occupying a confidential

Communication by bank director to co-director in individual capacity.— If the one making the communication is privileged to do so when acting in a special capacity, he will not be protected if he makes such a communication in his individual capacity. Thus a bank director is not justified in making a communication to a co-director in the public streets affecting the credit of a merchant, where there is no evidence of such a communication being confidential, although he might make such a communication to the board of directors in relation to one of the customers of the bank. Statements made to a minister of the gospel in his ministerial office have been held to be privileged. Vickers v. Stoneman, 73 Mich. 419, 41 S. W. 495. relationship to the communicant or having a corresponding interest or duty,[61] or to the public generally, provided such publication is necessary and proper in the protection of defendant's interest.[62] Thus it has been held that where publication in a newspaper is a reasonable mode of giving notice to third persons for the purpose of protecting defendants against the acts or representations of plaintiff, the fact that thereby the communication came to the notice of third persons having no corresponding interest in the matter would not of itself defeat the defense of privilege.[63] But the privilege may be lost if the publication is made maliciously or contains matter unnecessary for the protection of defendant's interest.[64]

b. Communications Against Present or Former Employee. Where an employer publishes matter derogatory to a present or former employee in order to protect himself against the acts or statements of such employee, the communication is privileged if made in good faith and confined to the occasion which justified its publication.[65] Thus it has been held privileged for an employer to distribute to subordinate agents a list of discharged employees with reasons for their discharge, when the purpose is to prevent unsuitable men from being reëmployed.[66] So where defendant, a trader, has been accused of charging for goods never delivered, he may vindicate himself by imputing the dishonesty to his servant.[67]

14. Communications of Public Interest to Members of Community Generally. In some of the decisions the rule has been stated that the fact that the subject-matter of the communication is one of public interest in the community of which the parties to the communication are members is sufficient as respects interest to confer the privilege, and that in regard to the matters of public interest all that is necessary to render the words spoken to be privileged is that they should be communicated in good faith without malice to those who have an interest in the subject-matter to which they refer, and in a fixed belief that the communications were true, such belief being founded on reasonable and probable grounds.[68] This rule has been applied to communications warning the public against frauds.[69]

15. Dictation to Stenographer or Clerk. As a general rule the dictation of a libelous letter by defendant to his private and confidential stenographer or clerk is not a privileged communication and this whether the letter is to be transmitted to plaintiff[70] or to a third person.[71] On the other hand it has been held that a solicitor intrusted to write defamatory matter on a privileged occasion on behalf of a client may, without losing the privilege, discharge his duty to his client in the ordinary and reasonable way of continuing his business, that is, by having the communication taken down and copied by a clerk.[72]

16. Communications by Attorney or Agent. If a communication by an agent or attorney to a third person is reasonably necessary and usual in the discharge of his duties to his principal or client, it is prima facie privileged.[73]

17. Repetitions or Insinuations. On the question whether words are privileged the same rule applies to repetitions of defamatory words originally published by others or insinuations of what is false that applies to false statements directly made.[74] The repetition of a defamation for the purpose of obtaining advice as to whether the person defamed should be notified of the report is not privileged.[75]

D. Public Criticism and News — 1. In General. It is sometimes said that fair and honest criticism in matters of public concern is privileged.[76] But in other cases a distinction is drawn between an ordinary privileged communication and the so-called privilege of fair criticism.[77] The interests of society require that immunity should be granted to the discussion of public affairs and that all acts and matters of a public nature may be freely published with fitting comments or strictures.[78] But the privilege is limited strictly to comment and criticism and

That in the latter case, the words may be defamatory but the defamation is excused or justified by reason of the occasion; while in the former case, the words are not defamatory of the plaintiff, and hence not libelous,— the stricture or criticism is not upon the person himself, but upon his work"); Burt v. Advertiser Newspaper Co., 154 Mass. 238, 242, 28 N. E. 1, 13 L. R. A. 97 (where it is said: "There is an important distinction to be noticed between the so called privilege of fair criticism upon matters of public interest, and the privilege existing in the case, for instance, of answers to inquiries about the character of a servant. In the latter case a bona fide statement not in excess of the occasion is privileged, although it turns out to be false. In the former, what is privileged, if that is the proper term, is criticism, not statement, and . . . if he takes upon himself in his own person to allege facts otherwise libelous, he will not be privileged if those facts are not true. The reason for the distinction lies in the different nature and degree of the exigency and of the damage in the two cases. . . . When private inquiries are made about a private person, a servant, for example, it is often impossible to answer them properly without stating facts. . . . But what the interest of private citizens in public matters require is freedom of discussion rather than of statement"). See also Sheckell v. Jackson, 10 Cush. the right to criticize does not embrace the right to make false statements of fact, to attack the private character of a public officer, or to falsely impute to him malfeasance or misconduct in office.[81] In some jurisdictions, however, it is held that even though the statements are not strictly true, defendant is not liable if there was probable cause for the statements and there is no proof of express malice.[82]

Defamation of appointee of candidates for office.— In order to inform the public of the conduct and character of an officer who is a candidate for reëlection, an elector cannot with impunity publish defamatory statements faith and on probable cause believed to be facts.[85] The publication of an attack upon a person who is not a candidate for the votes of the people, but who is seeking an appointive office, is not privileged.[86]

4. Books and Works of Art. Books, paintings, and other works of art are legitimate subjects of comment, and criticism, fairly and honestly made, is not actionable, however strong the terms of censure may be, without the averment and proof of special damage, unless it goes further and attacks the individual.[87] But the privilege of criticism cannot warrantably be perverted to the purposes of wilfully and falsely assailing the moral character of an author.[88]

5. Publication of News — a. In General. Newspapers as such have no peculiar privilege.[89] Defamatory matter published in good faith in the honest belief in its truth if false is not privileged because published as a mere matter of news.[90]

b. Freedom of the Press. The constitution of the United States and the state constitutions guarantee the right of freedom of speech and liberty of the press.[91] The term "freedom of the press" consists in a right, in the conductor of a newspaper, to print what he chooses, without any previous license but subject to be held responsible therefor to the same extent that any one else would be responsible for the publication.[92]

The reason for the rule has been thus stated: "The chief advantage to the country which we can discern, and that which we understand to be intended by the foregoing passage, is the security which the publicity gives for the proper administration of justice. It used to be said sometimes that the privilege was founded on the fact of the court being open to the public. Stockdale v. Hansard, 9 A. & E. 1, 3 Jur. 905, 8 L. J. Q. B. 294, 2 P. & D. 1, 36 E. C. L. 27, per Patteson, J. This no doubt is too narrow, as suggested by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, in Wason v. Walter, L. R. 4 Q. B. 73, 8 B. & S. 671, 38 L. J. Q. B. 34, 19 L. T. Rep. N. B. 282, 6 Wkly. Rep. 629, 96 E. C. L. 537. It is desirable that the trial of causes should take place under the public eye, not because the controversies of one citizen with another are of public concern, but because it is of the highest moment that those who administer justice should always act under the sense of public responsibility, and that every citizen should be able to satisfy himself with his own eyes as to the mode in which a public duty is performed." what defendant has charged.[29] So it has been held to be no defense that the person to whom the words were published did not believe them to be true.[30] On the other hand it is held that an action will not lie for words which, although actionable in themselves, were spoken under such circumstances as would not lead persons present to believe they were spoken as truth.[31]

e. Reports and Rumors Previously Existing. Nor is it a defense that at the time of publication the defamatory matter was the subject of general rumor or report.[34]

29. Gillis v. Peck, 20 Conn. 228; Clark v. Brown, 116 Mass. 504 (where plaintiff having taken property in jest had caused defendant to believe him guilty of larceny); Parkhurst v. Ketchum, 6 Allen (Mass.) 406, 83 Am. In an action by a married woman it is no defense that defendant was led by plaintiff's husband to believe the truth of the words uttered. McMichael v. Greenhaw, 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 561 [distinguishing Tibbs v. Brown, 2 Grant (Pa.) 39].

30. Marble v. Chapin, 132 Mass. 225 (holding that it is no defense that the words were spoken when no one else was present to one who knew them to be false and who did not repeat them until after action brought); Burt v. McBain, 29 Mich. 260.

31. Haynes v. Haynes, 29 Me. 247; Ritchie v. Stenius, 73 Mich. 563, 41 N. W. 687. See also Harry v. Constantin, 14 La. Ann. 782. But see Burt v. McBain, 29 Mich. 260, holding that an instruction that if the jury believed the words were spoken "without any intention to injure the plaintiff, and under such circumstances as would not lead the person who heard them to believe they were spoken as true, the plaintiff could not recover," was erroneous.

Words not inducing belief on part of strangers.— It has been held that where words are spoken under such circumstances of excitement or anger as would not lead the persons present to believe they were spoken as truth, they will not sustain an action for damages. Haynes v. Haynes, 29 Me. 247. Thus it is held that where defendant's language was a mere outburst of passion, induced by plaintiff's conduct toward his wife and himself, and was neither intended nor understood by the bystanders to charge plaintiff with the commission of a crime, defendant is not liable. f. Prior Defamation by Plaintiff. One libel or slander cannot be set off against another independent libel or slander, and hence it is no defense that plaintiff has previously libeled or slandered defendant[35] or a third person.[36]

g. Bad Character of Plaintiff. Nor is the bad character of plaintiff a complete defense.[37]

2. Unsuccessful Justification — a. Failure to Sustain Plea. Where the truth is pleaded in justification failure to sustain the plea by proof may be considered by the jury as an aggravating circumstance in estimating damages.[38] But the jury should be guided by the motive with which the plea is made; hence if it is interposed in good faith, under an honest belief in the truth of the matter published and with reasonable grounds for such belief, it cannot be regarded as an aggravation beyond the real injury sustained by plaintiff.[39] Indeed it has been held that if a plea of justification is made in good faith, and evidence is introduced honestly, for the purpose of supporting it, such evidence should be considered by the party in mitigation of damages, although it is insufficient to prove the truth of the plea.[40]

b. Withdrawn or Insufficient Plea.[41] Where defendant files a plea of justification a subsequent withdrawal of it will not, it has been held, render it inadmissible to show malice and aggravate the damages.[42] But it has been held that an invalid or insufficient plea of justification, upon which no judgment could have been rendered, is entitled to no weight in aggravation of damages under the plea of not guilty.[43]

B. Mitigation[44] — 1. Grounds in General. The rule has been stated that in an action for defamation two classes of facts are pleadable and provable in mitigation of damages: (1) Such as impeach the character of plaintiff; (2) such as tend to negative the malicious motive of plaintiff.[45] Code provisions

Insanity of defendant in mitigation of damages. see INSANE PERSONS, 22 Cyc. 1212, text and note 46.

Haste incident to newspaper business.—The mere fact that the haste necessary to prepare the defamatory matter for press prevented an investigation as to the truth has been held not to be a mitigating circumstance. Folwell v. Providence Journal Co., 19 R. I. 551, 37 Atl. 6. On the other hand it has been held to be admissible in mitigation of damages that defendants were engaged in the business of receiving newspapers from the publishers and distributing them to dealers, and that the volume of its business and the necessity of haste prevented the examination of the contents of the papers. Hawk v. American News Co., 33 N. Y. Suppl. 848, 24 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 255.

Other less offensive communications.— In Bradford v. Edwards, 32 Ala. 628, it was held that in a suit for slander, defendant cannot prove, in mitigation of damages, that in other conversations than those alleged he spoke of plaintiff less offensively.

Public interest in subject-matter of publication.— The importance to the public of a report made by a board of health cannot be taken into consideration as mitigating a charge that the report was induced by a reward offered to the person making it. Hamilton v. Eno, 81 N. Y. 116. So it is not a mitigating circumstance that the libel was published for the purpose of defeating plaintiff's election to a public office. Rearick v. Wilcox, 81 Ill. 77; Mattice v. Wilcox, 147 N. Y. 624, 42 N. E. 270.

Prior recovery by plaintiff.— It is not a mitigating circumstance that a recovery had been had against a defendant by the same plaintiff in another action for a libel which formed a series of numbers published in the same gazette and containing the libelous words charged in the second suit. Tillotson v. Cheetham, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 56, 3 Am. Dec. 459.

Husband's efforts to prevent spread of slander by wife.— It has been held that in a suit against husband and wife for words spoken by the wife, the husband's efforts to prevent the circulation of the slander do not consti-allowing both justification and mitigation to be set up in actions of libel and slander have not changed the rules as to what circumstances are mitigating.[46] Mitigating circumstances set up to negative malicious motives must have been known to defendant at the time of the publication and induced a belief of its truth.[47]

2. Truth of Charge. The truth of the defamatory words may be taken advantage of by way of mitigating damages if it is properly pleaded.[48]

3. Bad Character or Reputation of Person Defamed. The general bad character or reputation of plaintiff is a mitigating circumstance in libel or slander. Plaintiff in an action for defamation complains that defendant has injured his character or reputation; and therefore defendant may prove that plaintiff's general reputation was already bad, with a view of showing that no serious injury was inflicted upon him by the publication.[49] Evidence is admissible as to plaintiff's general reputation with reference to the matter charged in the defamation or his general reputation as a man of moral worth, without restriction to the particu-tute a mitigating circumstance. Yeates v. Reed, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 463, 32 Am. Dec. 43.

Absurdity of charge.— In Van Ingen v. Star Co., 1 N. Y. App. Div. 429, 37 N. Y. Suppl. 114, it was held that the right to recover exemplary damages where the publication was malicious is not affected by the fact that the charge was so ridiculous upon its face that no friends of plaintiff could believe it to be true.

4. Character of Defendant. Defendant cannot rely on his own bad character in mitigation of damages.[52]

5. Belief and Absence of Malice on Part of Defendant. Defendant may show in mitigation of damages that the libel or slander was published under an honest conviction of its truth arising from probable grounds of suspicion known to him at the time of publication,[53] or that he otherwise acted in good faith and without malice.[54] But it has been held that absence of malice mitigates exemplary and not compensatory damages,[55] and hence in a jurisdiction where compensatory damages alone can be recovered, absence of malice is immaterial and cannot be shown.[56]

6. Intoxication. It has been held that drunkenness may be shown in mitigation of damages.[57] But it has also been held that if the slander is often repeated
